"THE LAND THIEVES" A FEATURE OF FEATURES

Produced in El Cajon Valley, Southern California.
Will be released October 9th.
This film is the superlative of Western production.

The American Film Manufacturing Company of Chicago, asserts advisedly that it is unquestionably the greatest Western feature ever made by a moving picture manufacturer. It is perfect from every standpoint—photography, production, scenery and talent. Your audience will gasp with admiration at the astounding worth of this story as it is unfolded. You will gasp with admiration at the intense interest which it calls forth from the audience in question. Undoubtedly the most effective Western drama ever made by the Flying A organization in the West.

A FEATURE OF FEATURES. RELEASE DATE, MONDAY, OCTOBER 9th.

NOTE:—There are two Flying A Cowboy features released each week. Some of these features are better than others, but they are all good. The release days are MONDAYS and THURSDAYS.
Your Exchange will give you both each week, if you ask for them.
Our regular releases are described in the Film Synopsis Department of this publication.

LOST ILLUSIONS!

WE ALL HAVE

LOST ILLUSIONS!

We who write and read this—how many pet dreams and schemes we have seen shattered; how often and long we have eagerly waited for Things That Never Came; how many times we have watched for the Dawn That Never Broke. Just night—bleakness and blackness—failure and folly—pain and the death of the summer rose!

This is just an Allusion to "LOST ILLUSIONS"

Released, Thursday, Oct. 5th

It is a graphic tale of a married woman's love for a married man (a married man not her husband), and runs the gamut of all the human emotions. In the end peace and purity prevail, and Virtue (and Rex) are triumphant!

It is unnatural for one to be without "LOST ILLUSIONS"

TUESDAY, OCT. 10

The large lakes of Italy are alone in their glory. They possess an atmosphere that is not to be found about any other of the world's famous lakes. Lake Maggiore is the pride of all Italians and is here shown in all its beauty. Some excellent views are had of the Borromees Islands, and numerous character studies of native boatmen plying their queer craft.

Thou Shalt Not Steal

ON THE SAME REEL

A chronicle of the horrible shock of two would-be burglars who made a bad start by robbing a parson. An experienced crook would have known that a parson is lean picking. The parson is in part to blame for furnishing them with temptation by his solicitude for his "treasure." They thought it was money, but the treasure was only a sermon, entitled: "Thou Shalt Not Steal."

Running Fawn's Chief

SATURDAY, OCT. 14

A gripping narrative of frontier days when the crooked gambler was to be found in every town or camp. A man who cheats at cards will cheat at anything else, hence the underhanded means employed by a half-breed card sharp, in this picture, to revenge his exposure by a worthy Indian, and the Indian's rescue by Running Fawn, who later becomes his bride.

CAST.

Mrs Murray.....Miriam Nesbitt
Her daughter, Faith.....Mabel Trunnelle
George Washington.....Charles Ogle
Israel Putnam.....Robert Brower
Bob, a young Continental Officer.
Harold M. Shaw
British Officers..... Herbert Barrington
Stuart Holmes

To allow Putnam's division of the army, moving from lower New York to Harlem Heights, time to escape, Mrs. Murray and her daughter entertained the British officers. A stirring story is combined with the historical incident.

National Kindergarten Association

CAST.

Miss Gray, a young society girl..Mary Fuller
Roger Hewitt.....Marc McDermott
Murphy, a good for nothing..Edward O'Connor
His Wife.....Mrs. Wm. Bechtel
Mike, their lame child.....Kathleen Coughlin
Their other children..... Leonie Flugrath
Yale Boss
Harriette Mendel

A film of purpose, showing the need of more Kindergartens. As in our other films of a similar character, there is an appealing story told. This film is an aid to a noble work.

TOO MANY BURGLARS

Mrs. Brown is decidedly partial with her jewelry, leaving it be around in easy access to any one who might enter. Wishing to teach her a lesson, Mr. Brown writes a letter to his actor friend to enter his house as a burglar to scare her. But on second thought, Brown decides to play burglar himself. Wifey, however, reads the letter and retires in fear so when a real burglar appears upon the scene she thinks him her hubby's friend and treats him royally. The actor enters almost simultaneous with Brown, and, each thinking the other the real article, a fight ensues. Meanwhile, the real burglar, hearing the skirmish, hides in a clothes-closet until he is forced out by moth powder. The episode ends happily for everybody but the real burglar.

Approximate Length 999 feet.

Mr. Bragg, a Fugitive

Bragg has the Physical Culture fad but when it comes to a show down he weakens. Shame however forces him to resent an insult offered Mrs. Bragg by the butcher, and he punishes him. The meat purveyor falls, and Bragg, getting blood on his hand, thinks he has killed him, and for awhile is a self-accused fugitive from justice. Mrs. Bragg, with the aid of the police captain, keeps up the hallucination until he is cured of his "strong-arm" mania.

Approximate Length 997 feet

RELEASED OCTOBER 5th, 1911

The Making of a Man

How the Good in a Shiftless Actor Was Brought Out.

A barn-storming company is playing at the village theater and a young girl becomes fascinated by the leading man. There is a dance given during the stay of the company in the town, and the girl meets the actor, who attends. 'Tis the old story—her infatuation grows into love. Her father, who has a terrible aversion for actors, becomes almost despotic when he finds that his daughter is smitten with the actor, and his unreasonable discipline causes her to leave home to follow him. The actor realizes that he honestly loves the little girl, and so he marries her at once. Her father, however, forces her back home as she is under age. The actor determines to make himself worthy of her, and his ambitious efforts meet with success. He returns to claim his wife, but is told she is dead—for she was considered dead by her family when she finally left home in search of him. Fate, however, brings them together in a most unlooked for manner.

Approximate Length 1,000 feet.

Facts and Comments

THAT discreet reserve which characterized Mr. Edison in this country and which culminated in a pronounced reluctance to be interviewed, seems to have dissolved in the atmosphere of Europe, and cable and mail are kept busy transmitting remarkable and interesting utterances of the distinguished inventor. There is a distinct Mark Twain flavor about much of his talk; witness his hostile criticism of a statue, which the great American viewed with a "cigar clinched tightly between his teeth." Some of the things Mr. Edison said are proof of original views and powers of observation and well deserved to be recorded. It is difficult at this distance to tell the genuine from the apocryphal, for the European reporter is as little wedded to the truth as the American genus.

Mr. Edison is reported to have visited a moving picture entertainment in Berlin and to have remarked that it "beat anything he ever saw in America." The famous inventor, who dearly loves his joke, may have given the reins to the American proclivity for harmless joking when he said this, for some of his European interviews certainly seem replete with the spirit of the man who wrote "Innocents Abroad." If true, however, his sentiment is important, indeed. According to the reports of other travelers the moving picture entertainment in Germany is on a low level. This view is borne out by the trade papers in that country. In any event it will be very interesting to have Mr. Edison go into details on that subject when he returns once more to the country which he has helped to give European fame.

MORE than ever before the moving picture figures in the news reports of the daily press, and no longer simply as a convenient subject for "denouncing," "flaying" and "scoring" by men who make a specialty of that sort of thing. A curious report comes from the wilds of Missouri. In a small town in that incredulous State a farmer, tired of the rustic monotony and careless about the prejudices of his neighbors, bought himself a motor car and a moving picture theater. Such extravagance stirred the entire countryside, and presently anxious relatives began to fear that the farmer needed a guardian. In fact, they went to court and moved to have one appointed. A jury of rustics regarded the purchase of an automobile and a moving picture house as evidence of mental incompetency, and a guardian was promptly appointed for the reckless tiller of the soil. Perhaps it is just as well. The unfortunate man might have gone into the film-producing business next, and we might have to announce his releases every week. Worse yet, the public might have to look at them.

While all sorts of theories were set afloat as to the best means of exterminating cheap vaudeville, or at least driving it from the moving picture theaters, a wise judge out West has cut through the knotty problem as Alexander of old pierced the Gordian knot with his trusty sword. Complaint was made to the judge that the "vaudeville" in some of the moving picture houses within his jurisdiction amounted to disorderly conduct. The dispenser of justice went to one of the "mixed amusement temples" and patiently sat through one of the worst acts of "vaudeville" ever perpetrated. At the end of the performance he calmly announced to the "performers" that they were under arrest, and the guilty wretches were forthwith conducted before the tribunal of justice, where a fine of five dollars was imposed. The fine was made so low on the plea of a first offense. The judge's action is respectfully submitted to the careful consideration of exhibitors throughout the country. A Daniel come to judgment.

FROM the State of New Jersey comes a report from Mr. Wight, Commissioner of Charities and Corrections, to the effect that the pictures there have incresed "juvenile crime." "Juvenile Crime," words dear to public penologists and similar tribes. Mr. Wight is careful to say that he regards the good picture as a valuable asset of modern civilization, and he believes in its possibilities for good. He has, however, compiled a table of statistics which shows that the age of youthful offenders has lately steadily decreased, and that there are not only more bad boys in Jersey, but more very young bad boys. The newspapers show no other basis for the connection which Mr. Wight makes between the "increase of juvenile crime" and the moving pictures. Logically, therefore, the argument made by the commissioner against moving pictures is absolutely unsound. Because an increase of crime follows the increasing influence of moving pictures does not by any manner of means import that it is caused by the moving pictures.

We agree with Mr. Wight that the stories of Western brigandage and of Indian horrors have of late been horribly overdone. We know that there is today no complaint more frequent among moving picture patrons than the protest against this indefinite multiplication of "Wild West" reels. It has been said in explanation of this flood of "Western" and "Indian" stuff that these reels are made for European consumption and to meet the demand for these pictures in Europe. This may be true, probably it is true, but it contains nothing cheering for either the patrons or the exhibitors of American moving pictures. Should we be compelled to take these constant doses of stage Indians and a more or less artificial Wild West just because the "cultured" European hankers after this sort of thing?

The moving picture industry, or rather the film producers, have not always been fortunate in gauging the tastes and demands of their public. Instances are numerous where they have aimed too low and are still so aiming. Overproduction has not by any means sharpened their perceptions in the matter of divining the desires of the public that is worth while. Perhaps they do not care, being so comfortably sure of their market. Perhaps prosperity has blunted the keen edge of their desire to please and has made them indifferent. Whatever the cause, the effect is bad and needs heroic treatment. The mischief in this direction is done by only three or four companies, but the rest must suffer in consequence. When a film-producer is no longer amenable to public taste and opinion his usefulness begins to diminish.

Mr. Lowbrow.

By Louis Reeves Harrison.

I SUPPOSE he must be numerically weak, as I have never met him face to face, and I associate with any man that comes along—having no dog or horse for a companion. Either that or he is modest, for I have yet to hear any one blow about being a Lowbrow, yet I hear that he is very prominent in moving picture audiences, that plays are written—no, I will not say written—are produced for his especial benefit. I am sorry—we all are for that matter—that so many, many plays are presented for Mr. Lowbrow's especial delectation. We—and by that I mean some ninety millions of intelligent Americans and other castaways on these shores—would enjoy moving pictures very much better if the Lowbrow element of our population was not given such an undue share of consideration. It is said that ten millions go to the moving pictures. I have no doubt that many more than that number attend the little theaters, and that the present attendance could be easily doubled or trebled by bringing the average product up to the best now shown. Nearly all of the leading producers tell me that they are ready and willing to go the limit, and I have no doubt that the level-headed ones see clearly that these low-priced exhibitions, like costlier ones on the real stage, must eventually depend upon quality of performance for a permanent place in public favor. As in literature, they must give us the best that author and publisher can produce.

It is stated by a compiler of statistics that the circulation of high-class periodicals in this country exceeds that of similar publications throughout the world, and, according to the almanacs, the total attendance at colleges in the United States is greater than that of Great Britain, Germany and France combined. It would seem, therefore, that a lot of desirable patrons could be added to those now frequenting the little theaters if their appeal was not so extensively made to Mr. Lowbrow. Several producers, however, have informed me that exhibitors are calling for "raw meat" and plenty of it, thus shifting the responsibility to theater proprietors. Some of these may be deceived by the small boy, whose nickel is as good as the next fellow's, though one would think from the noise that he makes that it was a great deal better. The average little boy is no fool. He wants to see a fight, and that desire sticks to him after he grows up. His idea is all right in a primitive way, because the drama is truly a picture of struggle, of conflict between antagonistic forces, with the warm, sympathetic, universal, human heart on the side of right as opposed to oppressive wrong, but the noisy little boy is of character unformed, and not equipped to do the forming of plays intended for adults, whether the price of admission is one nickel or five. The fact that a man only pays a small sum for an entertainment should not be held up against him. There are probably many Lowbrows in the $2.50 theaters, and in the front row of the orchestra at that. The poor need diversion more than the rich, and the ultimate end of the picture play will be to give an entertainment for the mass that shall be comparable in quality to that now only reachable by the selfish class. The new art seems to have come into existence for that express purpose.

I think I saw Mr. Lowbrow one night at a picture show. He was a vaudeville performer, who was billed to do an "act in one." He came out from the wings with a smile of skull-like artificiality on his face, clapping his hands and singing "ta-ra-rum" to the prelude, as if we were all glad to see him. He had a "how-are-you-folks" manner of addressing the audience which he evidently expected would put him on intimate terms with the good-natured and thoughtless ones in the assembly; and he began, "As I was coming down the street," in a story that was all promise and no performance. When he finished, five hundred people were as silent as if he had been taking up a Sunday morning collection in church. His hard-eyed smile was fadeless; he went on with another and then another, until most of us looked ghastly, as if the motion of the ship had upset our stomachs. It was then that he betrayed his quality. Glancing down at the piano-player, he said between his teeth, "These boobs don't get me." Luckily, I had left my gun at home. After a while he got a laugh. It came from a stout woman who had just entered. Bridget, who had hung up the dish-towel, taken off her apron, and put on her dinky hat with a few sprigs of parsley in it and had come to the theater ready to laugh at anything funny whether it was or not. Some frowned at her, others regarded her with pity, and some—I was one—simply laughed because she did. She was such a good soul! She bulged out above and below a belt that was not unlike the constriction between two links of a sausage, and she rubbed her nose so comfortingly with the back of one red finger when she chuckled that she brought me a sense of relief almost equal to that of the vaudeville man. He fixed her with his glassy eyes—she was his one appreciative auditor—and then he sang a song that he had picked up somewhere while peddling collar buttons with his hat pulled over his ears. That man was a Lowbrow because he had underestimated his audience, and there are others. He was not to be blamed for imagining that the mental receptivity of those in front of him was on a par with the price of admission, but he was as low as his valuation of his fellow-beings.

Let playwrights tell good stories that are worth paying for; let director put on dramas that would command a price with a competitor in a manner worth paying money to see; let the little opera of the people draw the support of millions upon millions of our people, who have but faint realization of what there is in this business, or who still regard the picture show as an inferior sort of entertainment only fit for the children and servants. I have been long and steadily maintaining that what has seemed to be a profitable form of inexpensive amusement, a sort of a Coney Island attraction, is in reality a fine art, and I believe that its evolution will bring to the front men of established reputation, whose products will command a high price as long as the human heart warms to the human story.

We need cherish no ill feeling against Mr. Lowbrow—there is clay in the composition of all of us—but he is a drawback, and the sooner we regard him as one and accord more recognition to the men who are seeking to improve photoplays, to the benefit of producer, exhibitor and audience alike, the sooner will Mr. Lowbrow's cranium assume the normal shape of the dome above us. It never has been, and probably never will be, in the nature of things for the tail to wag the dog.

It will very shortly be difficult to find an industrial enterprise into which the moving picture has not entered. All these films have a double value, as while fulfilling their instructive and exhibitive purpose, they also possess a value when interspersed with the drama and the comedy. The writer believes the public welcome both the relief and value the information imparted by these pictures equally with the scenic and natural history series. A sensible and wise combination of pictures giving the relief from monotony would make unnecessary the call for unedifying vaudeville.

Reviews of Notable Films

"LAST DAYS OF HENRY III OF FRANCE" (Eclipse).

Reviewed by Jas. S. McQuade.

PROMINENT among the coming releases of George Kleine is "An Eye for an Eye," or the Last Days of Henry III of France," by Eclipse, to be released November 8. This full length film can be placed safely, side by side, with the great masterpieces which have brought dignity and educational importance to the moving picture.

Everyone who saw "The Taming of the Shrew" by the same manufacturers was delighted with the exceptionally clever acting and fine photography, and many of us, at the time, expressed the hope that Elipse would spring a number of delightful surprises of a similar kind in the near future. The first of these has arrived under the title already given, and in viewing it, one altogether loses sight of twentieth century associations, as he rubs clothes with French royalty, as it flourished in the last quarter of the sixteenth century.

The admirable art disclosed in the selection of exterior settings for this film and the careful study of interiors and furnishings of the period, merit unstinted praise. So also does the costuming of the characters, from king to servitor, which displays careful research and close familiarity with the clothing worn at the time.

Among the exteriors may be mentioned a fine front view of the king's palace, laid in extensive grounds and partly hidden by trees and shrubbery. Here the massiveness of the structure and the beauty of the architecture, and surroundings, suggest the atmosphere amid which kings move. Note that the interior of one of the king's rooms in the palace shows a scantiness of furniture. A solitary chair affords the only seating comforts of the room. This shows a nice conformity with the fashion of the times, and is another evidence of the intelligent care being taken by those in charge of the production. The interior of the royal tent at St. Cloud is another fine setting. The groups of officers and courtiers in the tent, surrounding the king before, and after, he has received his death wound, are more noble in pose and action than if the characters looked out from the canvas of a great painting.

The acting of the principals in the production of this film can be recommended as a criterion. The chief characters are King Henry III, Jacques Clement (a fanatical young monk), Henry of Navarre (a distant cousin of the king, and afterwards Henry IV), and the Duchess of Montpensier (a sister of the Duke of Guise). These characters have been assigned as follows: Henry III, M. Saillard, of the Antoine Theater; Jacques Clement, M. Gregoire, of the Odeon Theater, Henry of Navarre, M. Remy, of the Theater des Arts, and the Duchess of Montpensier, Madame Dermoz, of the Antoine Theater.

M. Saillard has given us more than a portrayal of Henry. His study has been so minute and analytical that we get glimpses of the very soul of the king, who has debased his manhood by debauchery. In the scene where he is confronted by the Duchess of Montpensier and the agent of death in revenge for the assassination of her brother, the Duke of Guise, we can see, notwithstanding his assumption of royal dignity, that he is seized by a great fear. A fleeting expression of countenance shows it; but he gathers strength when he thinks of his lineage and, as he kisses the medallion of his house, he proudly lifts his head and dares her to do her worst. The insolent backward glances thrown at the infuriated woman, as he proceeds to rejoin his courtiers, reveal a cruel heart and a mind that has ceased to respect womanhood, not to speak of a lack of royal dignity. Then when the meshes of the net are being drawn more closely to accomplish his death, and we see him cowering in a room of his palace, every entrance of which is guarded by his retainers, starting at the slightest sound and so abject that personal defense is impossible, M. Saillard gives us a clear view of his craven soul. In the death scene in the tent at St. Cloud, after the fatal blow has been struck and his followers rush in at his cry, Henry is king again. The shadow that haunted him has become a reality. There is now no show of fear of that great night shadow into which he is about to pass. Mustering strength, he rises and announces that Henry of Navarre will succeed him. Then he crumples up limply as the arms of his successor encircle him. It is a great death scene, and one that will be remembered long by all who see it.

M. Gregoire, of the ascetic face and neurasthenic fervor, worthily impersonates the young monk, Jacques Clement.

M. Gregoire [illegible] that Clement felt that a [illegible] from almost the [illegible] and that he is serving [illegible] what is noble, [illegible] himself of [illegible] and [illegible] of power do we find in history as [illegible] [illegible] has been [illegible] and presented to us by M. Remy! It takes us back to the days of assassins, when a true knight's sword represented [illegible] and as [illegible] or defense for the weak.

That haughty dame, the Duchess of Montpensier, [illegible] able double in Madame Dermoz. The [illegible] [illegible] the king is [illegible] and haughtily defiant. Her [illegible] of Clement by her charm or manner [illegible] that it is his sacred duty, leads to the death of Henry. The youth's soul revolts from the [illegible] for when the [illegible] woman throws the [illegible] that Henry's doom is sealed.

"THE AGGRESSOR" (Imp).

To those who may have [illegible] the high quality of photoplays [illegible] the hands of the I. M. P. Co., we recommend "The Aggressor" for a critical examination. It is seldom that anything quite so dramatic is issued by any maker of pictures and certainly none has offered a better example of motion picture plotting and or in serious portrayal of basic human emotions.

Scene from "The Aggressor" (Imp).

The story is laid in the Western mining country where men think and act primitively. A young miner abuses his pretty wife who deserts him for the first man who comes along—another miner. When the husband returns, the knowledge that his wife has left him does not seem to affect him seriously until he happens upon a cigar butt, which discovery conveys to him a realization that she has gone with another man. His jealousy is aroused and, gun in hand, he seeks the despoiler of his home.

In the meantime the man and woman have traveled far and are resting in camp. While going for water the man falls over a precipice and is badly hurt. While the woman moans in despair at the side of the injured paramour, the husband, who has been wildly following their trail, arrives and discovers them. The woman prevents an immediate killing and induces her husband to take the injured miner back to their cabin.

The injured man recovers and is about to depart when the husband intimates that there is a score between them to be settled. The interloper is reluctant to engage in any hostilities, but the husband forces the issue, with the result that in a pistol duel the husband is killed. A terrified witness to the proceedings which she is unable to prevent, the wife rushes to the body of her fallen husband. Finding him dead, she turns upon the other man and drives him from her presence.

The plot gives ample play for intense emotion and the work of the Imp players is gratifying in the extreme, in that they do not overplay their parts, which might easily be done. The photographic effects are appreciably heightened in the final scene where the survivor of the duel is seen slowly wending his way over the brow of the hill in the light of the rising sun. It is a picture that is highly creditable to the Imp Company.

"RAFFLES CAUGHT"—(Pathe).

FROM the Paris studio of Pathe Freres comes an unusual subject under the title of "Raffles Caught." The interesting features of this subject is the exceptional lighting effects and the splendid photography, not to mention the rather novel story and the excellent acting. Raffles, as most everyone knows, has become the appellation for the gentleman burglar. In this instance he is one of a party at a reception and is introduced to the hostess, a charming young woman, who is greatly attracted by him, and in whom he shows more than a professional interest.

When the guests depart we find Raffles intent upon his work. He gropes about in the darkness from one room to another using a flashlight to guide him, until he comes to what appears to be a safe for the reception of the family valuables.

The young woman retires to her chamber and prepares to go to bed. Here it must be explained that many private mansions in Europe are built with glass panels in the partitions between rooms, by means of which the occupant of one room may observe what is happening in the next room without opening a door and, if it happens to be night one standing in a dark room may observe without being observed. Such a window communicated between the woman's boudoir and the room in which Raffles is at work.

Awakened by the falling of a chair, the young woman gets out of bed and raising a curtain which covers the glass, peers through at Raffles. At first there is fear upon her face, but when she sees Raffles gazing lovingly at her photograph she appears greatly pleased. He produces a revolver and her pleasure changes to terror. The varying expression of feeling upon the faces of both players is remarkable.

Finally the young woman telephones to the police and then, when Raffles enters her chamber in his further quest for loot, she manages to hold his attention until the arrival of the officers of the law. As for Raffles, while making love to the woman he is not unmindful of his calling and it is amusing to observe his efforts to lay hands upon her jewels while bestowing his caresses. Although seeming to enjoy the novelty of the occasion the young woman nevertheless turns her thumbs down for Raffles when the police appear to relieve her of his delightful company.

In many respects this is a remarkable picture and is one that holds the attention from the first turn of the crank.

American Eclair Studio.

Branch of Famous French Picture Makers Established at Fort Lee, N. J.—Model Plant Installed.

SINCE the manufacture of motion pictures became a serious business in America, no concern, with that avowed purpose, has made a more auspicious beginning than that which marks the entrance of the Eclair Company upon the field of American manufacture. There are in this country, to-day, several splendidly equipped plants for picture making, but they are the result of several years of development from beginnings of the most humble nature, made without previous knowledge of the craft, which makes them all the more wonderful to contemplate. But under the present condition of things it would be hopeless for anyone to embark in the business of making pictures on similar lines; one must begin practically upon a footing equal to that of the most progressive manufacturer to merit attention. It is this necessity that has been fully recognized by the promoters of the Eclair enterprise in America and through that recognition, or by reason of it, is explained the adequate preparations now being made at the new factory at Fort Lee, N. J.

It was the privilege and pleasure of a representative of the Motion Picture World to pay a visit recently to that factory and studio and to meet there the president of the Eclair Company, Mr. Charles Jourjon, of Paris, and his corps of able associates in the building of the new plant. It will not be our purpose in this story to annoy our readers with a technical description of that plant for the reason that it is not easy for those not expert photographers to comprehend the intricacies of that highly specialized and scientific occupation. We will, instead, put ourselves in the places of our several thousand readers who are unable to visit the Eclair plant, and try to see things for them as they would see them if they had an opportunity.

Fort Lee, N. J., is an indefinite place. There are plenty of New Yorkers who never heard of it and have not the least idea where it is. Having received directions and made the trip, you will, if you ever should, find it a delightful little jaunt into the country and to a region that might as easily be a thousand miles from New York as it is within a 45-minute ride. There you will find all the delights of a quiet country village, with plenty of pure air and sunlight and repose, so utterly different from the atmosphere of the city you have left behind you but a few minutes before. You say at once that the choice of location has been a most happy one.

At the time of our visit the work of building was still going on. The factory, which includes the administrative offices and the photographic laboratories and workshop, was the only finished structure. It is of concrete, iron and hollow tile construction—all fireproof material and as complete and compact as one might imagine such a place could be. A guide will take you through and show you where the film goes in and where it comes out the completed product, but we would not advise you to attempt the journey alone. It is a veritable labyrinth of rooms and passageways. In their proper places will be seen perforators for punching sprocket holes in the film; printers for printing the pictures on the positive film; then baths of developers and fixers and tints through which the film must pass before it reaches the big revolving drying drums turned by high-speed motors. To the uninitiated all this is a maze, but through this maze it is possible to pass to completion 40,000 feet of motion pictures in a single working day.

This is the photographic branch of the business and was designed by and built under the direction of the French experts employed at the parent plant of the Eclair Company in Paris—and no one questions the superior skill of the French photographer, so we must accept this specimen of his designing as just about the last word in factory construction.

There are a few features of note. A ventilating system, extending to every nook and corner in the building, distributes filtered air and a heating plant regulates the temperature. All the chemicals used in developing and fixing are mixed in vats and distributed through pipes to the several tanks in the developing and fixing rooms. There is also a refining plant in the basement for the recovery of such constituent parts of the solutions used as may be thus saved.

Adjoining the factory will be two independent studio buildings. One is about completed. It is of similar construction to the factory, with the addition of glass for the roof and sides. Ample accommodations for directors and players have been provided. Private and general dressing rooms, lavatories and showers are provided for the comfort of the players. There is a spacious wardrobe room and quarters for the cameramen, carpenters and scene painters. Every requirement that convenience and approved methods suggest has been provided for in the plan and scope of the enterprise. The capacity of the studio is four sets or scenes. The second studio building will be constructed from the same plans and work will be commenced soon. It is the intention of the Eclair Company to build several of these studio buildings, believing that better results can be obtained by that method than if they were to build one large studio.

When considering this enterprise as a factor in the making of American pictures, the fact should be remembered that it is not an American company bearing the Eclair name, but an American installation or branch of the French Company Eclair, built from plans prepared in France, and will, in as far as is practical, be manned by French experts of long experience from the home plant. The importance of this was explained to The World's representative by President Jourjon, who has been here for the past month inspecting the completed work and directing future construction.

"Our reason for establishing an American plant is based upon a desire to give the trade an American picture made the Eclair way," said Mr. Jourjon. "We feel that there is no doubt about our ability to make good pictures, but we realize that the American market demands a picture produced agreeable to American conventions. We could not do that in Paris with French actors and French producers, so we have decided upon the ideal combination of American producers and players with French photographers and technicians."

"Then you must have a very hopeful view of the American market, Mr. Jourjon?"

"I have," was the quick response. "I am convinced that there is a lot in the future for pictures in America. Your public is demanding better pictures and more of them and there is plenty of room here for those of the highest quality and character. It is to that demand that we will appeal, as you will discover from our first American release. I am so deeply interested in this project that I should like to remain in America for some time to come and be more closely identified with its development. As it is, I am compelled to return to Paris shortly, though I do so with regret, you may be sure. The branch will be in good hands, however, so I am not fearful for the result. My friend, Mr. Brulatour, is well known to the trade and has consented to act as our political and financial adviser, so we feel that our interests will be well protected."

Mr. Brulatour, who was present at the interview, smilingly admitted his acceptance of the commission and explained that, while he would like nothing better than to cast his fortunes with the American branch of Eclair, his relations with the trade precluded his taking anything like an active direction of its affairs. To have a finger in the pie to the extent designated by Mr. Jourjon was quite to his liking and all the glory he could reasonably wish for.

Both President Jourjon and Mr. Brulatour were pleased with equipment and the selection of departmental heads, upon whom the active management of the enterprise will rest. Mr. M. Maire, chief cameraman and photographer, is a young man of wide experience in motion photography, having traveled extensively for photographic purposes. In the mechanical department Mr. C. DeMoos, an expert from the Paris plant, is in charge. Lawrence McGill, George LeSoir and Mr. Smiley at present compose the staff of directors, with Will S. Rising in charge of the scenario department. Ray Physioc, a scenic artist of ability, will have charge of the scenic department and George Rice is stage carpenter.

Important will be the announcement, made to the World representative, of the selection of Mr. Harry Raver for the position of business manager. Mr. Raver has been acting in the capacity of manager of publicity and sales for the Eclair for some time. His knowledge of the amusement business in its relation to motion pictures has impressed the principals of the Eclair Company to the extent that they have decided to extend his field of usefulness. Mr. Raver's early training in the amusement field began in a circus press department, in which he developed the showman's instinct to a remarkable degree. Later he became associated with the Parker enterprises, of Abilene, Kan., out of which association grew the firm of Darnaby & Raver, proprietors of one of the highest class of carnival companies ever organized.

When the craze for carnivals passed, Mr. Raver became interested in motion pictures, in which line his early training has been of great assistance. His knowledge of amusements and of the requirements of the public will enable him to render an uncommon service to the Eclair Company.

President Jourjon will probably remain here for two weeks longer before returning to Paris. He says that he is having the time of his life and there is no doubt that he speaks the truth. That he journeys the [illegible] of the Fort Lee plant is proved by the fact that he spends most of his time there, taking a deep interest in the work of the players. Accompanying him on this trip is M. Maurice, the chief technical expert of the Eclair Company, of Paris, who seems to be just as happy about the new plant as Mr. Jourjon. He will return to Paris with President Jourjon, having rejected a very flattering proposal to remain here.

We are advised that the first American Eclair will probably be released within the next few weeks and that it will be a two-reel production in recognition of the strong demand for subjects of that scope. Its appearance will be awaited with interest and [illegible] next week's World.

Canadian Censorship.

A Board Appointed By Ontario Government—Manitoba has a Voluntary Board Like New York—Censors for the Province of Quebec Appointed.

A representative of The Moving Picture World had an interview recently with Mr. G. E. Armstrong, the chairman of "The Board of Censors of Moving Pictures for the Province of Ontario." The board consists of three members, the other two being R. Wilson and O. Elliott. Mr. Wilson and Mr. Elliott both have had practical moving picture experience, Mr. Wilson being an exhibitor in the City of Toronto. The appointment of an exhibitor on a board of censors has always been advocated in these columns and it is pleasing to know that it has at last been realized.

The board was appointed in pursuance of an act of the legislature, which in turn was moved by public opinion. Said Mr. Armstrong in speaking on the subject: "The public has become disgusted with many of the pictures shown and it was public opinion which really put the new law on the statute book. We have as yet not caught up with the inspection and censorship of films of an older date, but we have set a time limit and will soon be in a position to devote ourselves exclusively to the censoring of new releases. We have made arrangements with the four exchanges doing business in Toronto and supplying not only the province of Ontario, but a large portion of the entire Dominion, to show all new releases before sending them out to exhibitors."

While Mr. Armstrong has had no previous experience in moving picture matters, he is a thorough believer in the higher destiny of the picture and especially does he praise the educational end of the industry. He is a sincere and conscientious friend of the picture and disposed to be liberal and friendly to manufacturers.

For the benefit of the Canadian exhibitor the more salient features of the law are reprinted below:

4. (1) The Lieutenant Governor in Council may appoint a board of censors to hold office during pleasure consisting of [illegible] who shall have power to permit the exhibition or disposition by payment or otherwise of films which it is proposed to use in the Province of Ontario and to suspend for cause the license of any operator.

(2) There shall be an appeal from the Board of Censors to the commissioner or court designated and pursuant to the conditions prescribed by regulation of the Lieutenant Governor in Council.

5. No cinematographic, moving picture, biograph or other similar apparatus shall exhibit any films which have not been examined by the Board of Censors, and no such cinematographic, moving picture machine or other similar apparatus shall be kept or exhibited for entertainment until the owner, lessee or exhibitor of such machine has complied with the regulations made by the Lieutenant Governor in Council and obtained a license from the Provincial Treasurer.

6. All films passed or purported to be examined by the said Board of Censors shall be stamped in such manner that the stamp will show the censor and no exhibition of said pictures can take place or be permitted on any public street or thoroughfare or other public place on account of anything contained in such film.

7. (1) The fees on application for every cinematographic, moving picture machine or other similar apparatus, the issue of licenses or transfer of every film exchange and for [illegible] moving picture machine or other similar apparatus shall vest and be payable to the Provincial Treasurer or [illegible] for.

(2) The amount of such license fee, which amount may be different in the case of the same or [illegible] in the case of the owner, lessee or manager, and in the case of the person operating such machine or apparatus of every class and from time to time by regulation of the Lieutenant Governor in Council.

The United States Government has awarded a contract to the Selig Company, of Chicago, to make a series of educational moving pictures showing the workings of all the departments. President Taft and his cabinet talked the matter over at length and the President authorized the contract and referred the details to the cabinet officers of the various departments.

Advertising for Exhibitors

Conducted by EPES WINTHROP SARGENT.

SEVERAL correspondents have asked information as to the card catalogue system of keeping track of the releases and for their benefit we offer a sample card. The card for the Imp release of August 3, "The Call of the Song," should look something like this:

Call of the Song, The. Aug. 3, '11. Imp.
Ad. 9/176	S. 9/228	C. 9/465
Run Aug. 26. Can repeat.

The top line is self-explanatory. It is an Imp film released on August 3. The advertisement may be found on page 176 of volume nine, the story of the film on page 228 and the criticism on page 465. It is not unlikely that there was some special mention made of this film and in such case the volume and page number is sufficient. This card is filed under C in the Imp division of your file and when the film comes in it requires but a moment to locate the card and from that learn all about the film from the file.

File Your Copies.

When your copy of the Moving Picture World comes in put it on file at once. Binders may be had at the stationery stores, but there are simpler ways of binding. The plan followed by the writer is quick and inexpensive and holds the copies intact until another bound volume may be had for permanent reference.

At the hardware store obtain a spring punch with a hole ⅛ or 3-16. It will cost about thirty-five cents, but the punch must be renewed occasionally, the tube costing fifteen cents. Make a metal guide that will permit you to always gauge the holes exactly, say ⅜ of an inch from the back and a third of the distance from the top and bottom. If you can get a piece of two-point brass rule from a printer it will be just the thing. The holes can be drilled or punched. With a pencil mark the points for the two holes, punch them and run a stout shoestring through the holes, tying all the numbers of one volume together. It is a little less comfortable to read the paper in this form, but it pays to get the issues on file as soon as received and keep them there.

The Moving Picture World will hereafter be printed in four volumes a year, commencing January, April, July and October, and the pages of each volume are numbered from 1 to the final page. This greatly simplifies the search for an item since you are able to disregard dates and merely look for the page. Keep the newest number on the bottom and the pages will run consecutively.

The World Gives All Information.

The pages of the Moving Picture World contain all that is necessary, but if you want to elaborate the system and check the criticisms of others merely write in the date. With this elaborate explanation further comment seems unnecessary, but readers desiring additional explanation will be answered by mail if they will enclose a return cover.

The paper should be entered up as soon as possible after its receipt, new cards being made out for every title not already in the file, whether this is found in the advertising pages or in the text or tables. Two drawer files may be had as low as $3 and by getting sections the first outfit may be added to. Cards cost $1 a thousand and index cards from five cents up per alphabet.

Advertising Booklets.

From the Tenth Street Theater, Kansas City, comes a program book that reflects decided credit upon H. B. Lapp, the manager, and F. W. Meyers, his advertising agent. The house uses two first-run films daily and the right hand pages are given over to the musical program and the stories of the films, a page being devoted to each day. The vaudeville program is thrown to the back of the booklet and occupies a single page with the change of bill properly announced.

It is printed on heavy paper with a severely simple title page in blue on a yellow tint block, with just a touch of red to brighten and an excellent line cut of the theater lobby in black. It is effective and dignified in every way and decidedly better than would be a more ornate design. It creates at a glance the impression of solidity of establishment, and removes the house from the suggestion of cheapness and sensation that has done more to hurt the average photoplay theater than the non-expert is able to realize.

It's Well to Use Cuts.

In these days of personality it would, perhaps, be well to illustrate the pages with thumb nail cuts of some of the favorite players, after the style used in the Vitagraph bulletins, or it should be possible to obtain from the manufacturers electros of the trade marks to be inset in the description of the product of that maker. Sometimes the makers will loan electros if the house will give assurance of return, but it would be almost as cheap to get a cut made and pass it on to some other house at half price when it has served its first use. Illustrations of some sort should be used occasionally if at all possible as the illustrated booklet is more apt to be preserved, and this makes an important talking point with the advertising agent.

Even at the expense of advertising space, there should be a page or more of general reading matter about the players and the plays. The information may be had from the columns of this paper and the recently established page of personalities will be invaluable to the live manager. Set it in six point, two columns to the page and every line of it will be read.

Valuable Advertising Free.

There is no more effective form of advertising a theater than the weekly booklet if it be done well, and if the theater has a reasonably large clientele, enough advertising may be obtained to more than cover all expense. If the printer can get a part of the job to you by Wednesday of the week before, run a slide on the screen to the effect that advance copies will be sent those who deposit stamps at the box office.

If a patron hands in a quarter take the address and mail to him the next twenty-five issues. It will put copies in the home—where the advertiser wants them to go—and it will give assurance that the patron is fully advised of the coming week's entertainment. If you word your advertisement attractively, you'll pull him in three or four nights a week instead of once or twice. The same impulse that leads a man to sprint a block after a street car, at the imminent risk of being run down by the one following, will cause him to want the advance information and if you make the sheet attractive, he will value it more if he has to pay than if it is sent him free. It is only human to value that which costs something above the free article, and the fact that he is a subscriber gives him a sort of proprietary interest in your house and your program.

Getting the Advertisers.

Getting the advertisers to come in is not going to be a simple matter. The large advertisers do not go into the small sheets. They want to talk circulation by the hundred thousand, and they can find plenty of persons who will talk in those figures at a smaller price per thousand than you can afford to make. It is time lost if you go after the big stuff unless you can find some general program printer who will handle your sheet complete and make you a flat payment for the privilege.

In making a contract for such a deal be careful to specify that you reserve ample space for yourself, that copies must be delivered at specified times and that the issues must be kept up to a certain standard of typographical excellence. It is even more important that it be guaranteed that objectionable advertising be kept from the pages. Medical advertising, an excess of whiskey advertisements, catchpenny devices and some other forms should be barred, and unless you can be certain that these will always be kept out, it will be better to keep the publication yourself and be assured that you'll not have to be ashamed to hand the booklet to your women and children patrons.

To Guarantee Reading.

Sometimes at the start some trick that will insure the reading of the advertisements may be effectively employed. One of the best is to have the printer make some intentional mistakes in spelling, giving one or more prizes to the person finding the greater number of errors. The prizes for one week should be awarded the week following as to give out the Monday prize on Wednesday would advise the contestants for the remainder of the week as to the errors to be looked for. Suppose that you boom the usually bad Monday business by making slide announcements of the winners of that day's mailing out such tickets as are not called for then, after the night show. It may be required that the marked program be left at the box office, but this is objectionable in that it does not leave your own and the other advertising in the hands of the patron.

A better plan is to have coupons printed somewhat like the following form:

Palace Theater Chicago, Texas	Palace Theater Chicago, Texas
Date . . . No. . . .	Date No.
Retain this check for your identification	Attach this half to your answer and mail or leave at box office

With a ten cent dating stamp and a stamp numbering consecutively in duplicate the blanks can be filled in, the numbers as the clips are received from the printer, the date on the day of issue. A numbering stamp will cost from $4 upward.

Spread the Prizes.

Explain that the word and page number of each error must appear in regular rotation and that only words used in the advertisements will count. Your ticket seller can go over the answers when the house is in. Either she or the doorkeeper may give out the coupons as the ticket is purchased or given up. Don't be too stingy with the prizes, give out from two to five pairs of admission, but have it understood that while any patron may compete seven days a week, if desired, but one prize will be awarded any one person in any one week. Don't let some proofreader or some clever child capture all the prizes. It looks bad to the audience and it discourages competition.

It is best to have the coupon good only until the day following.

This gives the advertiser a guarantee that his advertisement will be read by a majority of your patrons and disposes at once of the most potent objection to small advertising. After he gets the habit you may drop the scheme or switch to something else, but boom your booklet like you boom your theater by keeping always at it.

You Will Need Dated Features.

Any house that can show a couple of thousand circulation weekly can get the locality advertising and the bigger the house the wider the field, but make the booklet something that is read and kept; not merely a program or the cold announcement of the films. If you use first-run stuff you know what is coming; if you do not, at least specify date and manufacturer for a part of your service even if it is but one reel a day. You must have something to boom with whether you use the booklet idea or not.

And as a last word, don't try the booklet—or any other form of advertising—until you can do it creditably. Use good paper, good ink, good display, good press work and good reading matter or do not try the scheme. The cheap, smudgy booklet is no advertisement unless you are kin to that hotel proprietor in Texas who glories in the fact that he runs the worst hotel in the United States.

A correspondent of an Austrian kinematograph journal expresses himself with some bitterness in regard to the inconsistency of the authorities in regard to restrictions on juvenile patrons. No restrictions, he says, whatever, are imposed upon children and young people in regard to variety and other theaters, either as visitors or performers at these exhibitions. They very often leave these places in a state of great excitement and instead of going home direct, loiter on the way to talk over what they have seen or have taken part in. The consequence is they arrive home very late, or sometimes not at all. In Austria-Hungary, Spain and other states, no restrictions are placed upon children visiting variety and other theaters, and yet when we come to the kinematograph, every obstacle is put in their way. Sticklers for morality should, at least, manifest some consistency in their methods, and if it is considered advisable to prohibit in the one case, why not also in the others? Equal justice without partiality should be meted out all round.

Among the Chicago Picture Houses.

By C. Young.

The Marion Theater, on Halsted and 39th streets, has just celebrated its first year under its present owners. Mr. and Mrs. Rose, who, though having no experience in operating a theater when they started the Marion, have proved to their own satisfaction as well as their neighbors that a policy of pictures only could be made to pay in a locality where cheap vaudeville had always been an important feature of the bill. They were fortunate in securing at the start a good operator, Julius Holzapfel, who has had no small part to play in the success of the house, by putting up at all times a well-lighted picture—something which was a rarity in the neighborhood until the Marion opened its doors. The theater started with Independent service, but the exchanges were unsatisfactory, and Mr. Rose soon changed his service to the Spoor branch of the General Film Company, which has uniformly supplied a high-class service. On September 15th, the anniversary of the house, Mr. Rose featured a reel which most managers would contemptuously call "junk," because it was some four months old—Edison's "In the Barnyard Court Ahead." Even though it was the third reel, the "junk" went over, because of the very human story it told. Mr. Rose has decided that the people of his neighborhood do not really care for Western pictures, and they are no longer featured, except as second or third reel. Instead, he is taking advantage of some old films of two years or so ago, which were lately resurrected at the Spoor branch, such as Selig's "Stirring Days in Old Virginia," and featuring them.

At 33rd and Morgan streets, in the heart of a Lithuanian settlement, there is a little house which has always enjoyed a good picture. It has been closed down for some time, and has been recently opened again. Manager Lang presents nearly the same show as the former owner did, except that he runs three reels, while the first owner showed but two. Mr. Lang's operator, Philip Upp, is one of the best operators I have so far met, and certainly delivers the goods on the curtain. With the good picture projected by Mr. Upp, the success of the house is almost assured, and it only remains for the manager to get the kind of films required by the neighborhood. At present, old Pathe films and such others, supplied by the Morton Film Exchange, are used, which is at least playing safe, since these films will go in almost any locality.

On Halsted street near 33rd, I witnessed one of the most miserable shows I ever saw. The films were little better than junk, the projection was a joke, an orchestra (?) of violin, drums and piano accompanied the pictures, and the ventilation of the place was conspicuous by its total absence. The picture on the curtain was little more than a blur, consisting of a huge ghost and hardly anything else, not even bright enough to flicker. The side lights were red, irritating the eyes, and ruining what there was of a picture. Several violations of the fire department's rules were in evidence—the rear exit was covered with drapery; the side lights were red (misleading as to the location of the exits; if this is not a violation of the law, it ought to be); a door opened from the operating room into the auditorium and was kept open, and a number of people were standing in the entrance, where they had no business to stand. This theater has started up a number of times in the past year or so, each time to close down after running a short time, due to poor management and poor projection, but never before have I seen it so poorly operated as it is now. It is now only a question of time when this manager will shut down, like his predecessors, and go back to his trade of butcher or baker, or whatever it was, thoroughly disgusted with the picture business, and disillusionized as to its being a gold mine. It may have been once, but the time is long past when anyone could jump in and start a show, and make money without giving full value for the money received.

I went over to the Senate Theater to see L. E. Riner's machine in operation equipped with his soft rubber rollers, and to verify his claim that they steady the picture. I saw their work and can truthfully say that they do seem to help the picture, and save many stops when bad or loose patches go through. Such patches would almost always cause a break or a shutdown with the ordinary steel rollers, but the soft rubber idlers seem to make the film cling to the sprocket and go through; when the patch is very bad, the film sometimes jumps a sprocket hole, causing a misframe, but this is not so bad as to have to stop the machine and re-thread it. Also, with these rollers, considerable pressure can be put on the film to keep it on the sprocket, which cannot be done with steel rollers.

Lecture on the Three Reel Production "Foul Play."

(Edison, Oct. 6.)

By W. Stephen Bush.

The following is written for the aid and benefit of the exhibitor who wishes to feature and properly present this production. The picture does not need a lecture, running with every scene, but there are many points which can be made clearer by explanatory remarks. These scenes will be clearly indicated hereafter. It is suggested that a short preliminary explanation be given before the operator begins with the first reel. Perhaps some such remarks as these may be found useful:

Introductory.

"In presenting to you, ladies and gentlemen, this evening's entertainment, a few words of explanation may not be out of place. 'Foul Play' is the title of a well-known novel by Charles Reade, with whose works some of you no doubt are acquainted. It is a thrilling and romantic story and will be unfolded before your eyes in three reels. You will see it as you would a drama in three acts, only the action will be swifter and the intermissions shorter. The first reel will show you two young men, one honorable and unsuspecting, the other crafty and criminal. To pay his gambling debts the bad fellow forges the name of his father on a check and gives it to the other man, who endorses and cashes the check and is arrested as a forger and sent to prison in a colony for five years."

After these remarks have the operator start the first reel and explain the first picture as follows:

Scene 1.

"Arthur Wardlaw, son of a rich merchant and friend and pupil of Robert Penfold, while a student at Oxford, suffers heavy losses at the gaming table. He gets deeply into debt.

"With the aid of Penfold young Wardlaw graduates from the University and is made a partner in his father's business."

The next scenes up to the title "General Rolleston and his daughter Helen, guests at Arthur's dinner" may be covered by the following remarks:

"Penfold, wishing to open a school, asks Wardlaw for a loan. The latter conceives the plan of forging his father's name on a check, made payable to young Penfold. He sends the forged check to Penfold and tells him to take out seven hundred pounds and give the rest (thirteen hundred pounds) to him. Suspecting no wrong, Penfold cashes the check and tells his father about his good luck."

When the scene with the title "General Rolleston and his daughter Helen guests at Arthur's dinner" is flashed on the screen, continue lecture as follows:

"General Rolleston, a retired soldier, and his daughter, to whom young Wardlaw is engaged to be married, and old Wardlaw. A messenger insists on seeing old Mr. Wardlaw to find out whether his signature on the two thousand-pound check is genuine. Old Wardlaw denounces the check as a forgery."

The concluding scenes of this reel may be covered by the following remarks:

"Detectives call at the house of Penfold and arrest him as a forger. He turns for help to Wardlaw. The latter is made sick by fear and does not appear at the trial to clear his friend. In consequence, Penfold is found guilty and sentencved."

END OF REEL I.

In the intermission following explain the changes in the situation of the parties as they will appear in the second reel, as follows:

"Penfold has been sent to a penal colony of which General Rolleston is governor. When this second reel opens he is employed as a gardener on the general's estate. He is deeply in love with the general's daughter, Helen, the fiancée of young Wardlaw. Penfold is now known as Seaton and has earned his parole as a convict.

Scene 1.

With this explanation begin the second reel. You have just explained the meaning of the first scene in the second reel and need therefore say nothing during Scene 1.

Scene 2.

"Burglars visit the home of General Rolleston and are foiled by Seaton."

Scene 3.

"Young Wardlaw on a visit to General Rolleston's estate, meets Helen to make arrangements for her coming to England and marrying him. Helen tells him of Seaton's bravery and asks Wardlaw to secure him a position. Wardlaw, who does not know that Seaton is the same as Penfold, secures a position for him with White & Co., a friendly Australian firm.

Scenes 4, 5 and 6.

"Young Wardlaw, now sole head of the business, the father having retired, conceives a scheme to retrieve the fortunes of his house, which under his management have greatly suffered and brought the house to the verge of bankruptcy. He fits out two vessels, one the Shannon, the other the Prosperine. He loads the Shannon with gold and the Prosperine with lead. The cargo of gold on the Shannon is insured for a very large amount and is then by Wardlaw's confederate, the mate, Wylie, secretly transferred to the Prosperine. It was intended that Helen should sail on the Prosperine, but through a delay she is forced to take passage on the Shannon. Seaton, to be with Helen, shaves off his beard, disguises himself as a clergyman by the name of Hazel and gets on board the Shannon by means of an order from his firm."

The rest of the scenes in this reel may be covered as follows:

"Wylie, the mate, who had promised Wardlaw to scuttle the ship is surprised by Hazel in the act of boring a leak. He is recognized by Wylie as a convict on parole and therefore can do nothing to save the ship. When the ship has to be abandoned, Wylie and the crew go in one boat; Helen, Hazel and a sailor named Cooper go in another. Cooper confesses that Wylie has scuttled the ship. Helen, Hazel and the dying sailor are adrift. They at last find land, an uninhabited island. The rest of the crew are picked up at sea. Helen and Hazel make their home on the unknown island. He paints on one of the rocks an appeal for help to all passing vessels.

"In England news comes of the sinking of the heavily insured vessel. Wylie brings news to Wardlaw of the success of their scheme and receives his pay. Old Penfold, the father of the innocent convict, is still with the old firm. News comes of the arrival of the general, the father of Helen. Now it dawns upon Wardlaw that Helen is not with her father and he learns that the vessel bearing her was wrecked and she herself is a castaway or has been drowned in the sea.

END OF REEL 2.

Nothing need be said between reel 2 and 3. As soon as the third reel is begun, continue your remarks as follows:

Scenes 1, 2, 3 and 4.

"Having discovered just where on the globe their island is situated, the castaways begin to plan how to escape. Hazel carefully calculates latitude and longitude and then catches a number of birds, around whose feet he ties messages telling of their plight and whereabouts and asking for rescue.

"The father of Helen starts out in search of her in a boat equipped by the elder Wardlaw. One of the ducks is caught by Helen's father on board the relief ship sent out for their rescue. The vessel is at once steered toward the island. Hazel gives Helen a torch to light a pile of faggots, always held ready to be a signal to passing vessels. Helen, not wishing to separate from the man who has saved her life and provided for her, decides not to light the pile, that they may not be discovered and parted. Hazel follows her, tries to take the torch out of her hands to light the pile, but Helen snatches it from him and casts it into the sea.

"The general in the meantime has found the island and meets his daughter. He recognizes Hazel as the paroled convict Seaton, but shakes hands with him, because grateful for his services to Helen. Helen learns that Hazel is a convict on parole and refuses to believe it. He admits it, but for the first time justifies himself, telling the truth to the effect that Wardlaw was the forger and protests his innocence. Helen believes him and promises to do all in his power to clear his name in England. He remains behind.

"Helen, arrived in England, tells Hazel's father of the escape of his son from perishing in the wreck. Hazel leaves the unknown island and comes to England. Wylie, the confederate of Wardlaw, tells the latter of Hazel's arrival in England and Wardlaw writes to the inspector of police to arrest Hazel. The latter confronts Wardlaw in his own office, shows the opinion of the handwriting expert that the forgery was committed by Wardlaw. When a detective comes to arrest Hazel, alias Penfold, the confession of Sailor Cooper, implicating Wardlaw, is produced and Wardlaw is forced to sign a confession exonerating Penfold. Wardlaw begs permission to get his coat and goes to an adjoining room. A shot rings out a moment later, telling of the end of Wardlaw. Helen and Penfold see justice done and their union follows."

NOTE—Wherever the services of a lecturer are not available, the exhibitor will do well to have the words of the lecture reprinted in pamphlet form and distributed widely in his locality. The results will surprise and gratify him.

Music for the Picture

By CLARENCE E. SINN

A COMMUNICATION signed "Virginian" says: "Chicago's letter in the Moving Picture World of July 1st is interesting reading, especially for those of us who earn our daily bread and cheese by doping out piano music eight hours per day. I have worked North and South in the business and find a vast difference in the audiences. As a rule in the South they demand the best and most appropriate music to tell a picture story, and the life of a fake, noisy pianist is short indeed. The people are by inheritance temperamental and fall to tears and laughter instantly. All classes understand music by instinct and managers are hard to please.

"The accepted 'correct music' for any motion picture is only that which helps to unfold the plot or tell a story. It may be a medley of classic, operatic, comic, patriotic, or dramatic, but it must be so threaded together that it carries the audience on with the action of the story until "Passed by the National Board of Censors" is flashed across the screen.

"Five years experience proved to my satisfaction that popular stuff can be successfully played into most pictures, but we can't stand for death, renunciation or the pathetic to the tune of a popular rag or comic song. The Southern audiences won't stand for it. They feel everything and I believe they were spoiled from the start by the very quality of pianists, really refined and educated men and women who took up the work tempted by the salaries. By degrees the fake pianist edged in, and perhaps he does not have a time making good.

"I lost my job on a try-out in a New York theater because the manager said, "You play well, but we want popular stuff so they can sing. Go back and try again." I doped out 'Pony Boy' and 'My Wife's Gone to the Country, Hurrah!' and all the current songs and made good, but I couldn't stand 'My Wife's Gone to the Country, Hurrah!' shouted from a few hundred throats while I wanted to rescue the heroine from the burning ship with dramatic stuff. So I tried the Agency next day and found a really swell moving picture house where only continuous improvisations were allowed; absolutely nothing popular or that had ever been in print. Well, most of it would not have been received in the music stores, but the manager knew what his patrons demanded.

"I find that a wide knowledge of musical composition is essential, also a quick imagination and the power to make the audience feel the story. As a manager advised me years ago, 'make your music tell the story; if it does not, it is all wrong.' And how is a pianist to do this unless he is able to sink into the picture himself and let go of his imagination. It is sometimes—ofttimes unappreciated work, but the audience can be led up to appreciation. Americans, as a mass, are only in process of forming a musical taste. They can be made to understand and enjoy a picture by the aid of music and not stop to realize whether it is a rag or comic, and thus forget to knock the music."

I have heard of the excellent quality of music generally found in the Southern picture theaters. You infer that the Southern audience was "spoiled" in the beginning by its good quality of music. I wish more people were spoiled in the same way.

A. F. K. says: "I have been playing the pictures about three years. Extemporize some but not for all pictures. I memorize a great deal of my music and in that way pay close attention to the picture. I use popular songs occasionally, but not as much as my manager wants me to. Now I have no objection to playing popular songs if they are appropriate, but my chief difficulty is that I cannot think of things quickly enough to be of much use. I am familiar with a good many songs and their choruses, but I have always found it a hard matter to think of just the exact thing which would have fitted until after it is all over. I suppose I am slow-witted, though I hate to admit it, but I noticed one of your correspondents complain of a similar affliction a short time ago, so I am not alone in this. But it is not to tell you my troubles that I am writing this; it is to tell the way I am getting around them. Possibly it may be of assistance to some others. I took a hint from your Washington correspondent who explained the way she made a song in her memory by indexing all her music. My scheme was to index the titles of all the songs I knew, putting the sentimental and 'love songs' under one head, the 'drinking songs' under another, 'base-ball songs' under another, and so on, classifying each as well as I could. This took some time as I have music to only a few and many [illegible] names as they occurred to me, but I found that the mere writing them down was of great help in refreshing my memory. Now when a scene is shown in which I think I can use a particular kind of song chorus, I glance at the names under that heading and usually find something I can use. Whenever I play a new song which I think may be useful or suggestive of any particular scene I enter the name in my index and make it my business to learn it. It is surprising what a training this has been to my memory. I have been doing this for only a few weeks and now have 'at my finger tips' about half of my indexed pieces, and will have them all in a short time. [illegible] titles serves to fix them in the mind and makes it easy to recall them with little or no effort. I am so well pleased with my "scheme" that I feel quite enthusiastic and want to pass it along."

I wish every player was as generous in sharing his "schemes." There are many little difficulties confronting us all, some of a common nature which interest us all. Here and there will be found one who has overcome some obstacle in a practical manner. It is only by sharing the little grains of information acquired by our own experience that we can hope to build up anything resembling technical knowledge in this our chosen line of work. Not that I think A. F. K.'s experiment adds to the "technic" of playing for the picture, but I wish to commend the spirit in which it is offered. I dare say her "scheme" will be helpful to others. I know from my own experience that it is not always easy to instantly think of "just the right thing at just the right time." Much obliged, A. F. K. Next time you think of anything that seems good, pass it along again. Perhaps you will encourage others to do likewise.

One who signs herself "From a Small Town in Pa." writes a pathetic letter which she asks me to answer in this page, but as her complaint lies outside of my jurisdiction I do not see how I can suggest anything to help her. The letter is very long and the gist of it is that she "writes all the ads, makes them complete for wiring (that appears to be the word), plays piano continuously during the shows, including the time they take in changing reels, tries to keep a green operator posted on his focus, helps to select all the extra pictures and watches an alley exit door which is open all the time; and all this for nine dollars a week, half of which she gets and half of which she does not. (One of the managers, being a relative, does not think it worth while to pay his half of the lady's salary). Now they want to cut her down to six dollars per, half of which is likewise a practical salary, and half theoretical only. She wants to know what to do. From her own account she must be quite an important part of the show-shop, and I should think she was due for a raise in salary rather than a cut. Pluck up your courage and make a stand. If they don't "come across," try a want ad. in the Moving Picture World. Among its thousands of readers someone will offer you a better job than you now have. That is all I can suggest.

About once a week or such a matter I manage to drop into Sittners' North Avenue Theater, not only on account of the splendid pictures (he runs the best Independent films), but chiefly because of the good music. Miss Edith E. Walling, the lady who presides at the piano, is an excellent pianist and a very clever accompanyist. Her musical setting to "Romeo and Juliet" was very fine. In addition to this she is not afraid to use popular stuff if [illegible] pictures when the number is suggestive of the scene.

My opportunity for "doping out" pictures has been slim this week; however, I can suggest music for the following:

"THE BATTLE OF TRAFALGAR" (Edison).

1. "Reconciliation" (pub. by Witmark) till "The Last Letter Before the Battle."

2. "Parting" (same pub.) till "Sighting the Enemy's Fleet." March movement till "Nelson's last Entry in His Diary."
3. "Meeting" (same pub.) till "Clearing the Decks for Action." "Rule Britannia" till "October 21st, 1805."
4. Hurry for battle till "The Cockpit of the Victory."
5. Plaintive till "Avenging the Fatal Shot."
6. Hurry till "Captain Hardy Reports to Lord Nelson."
7. Plaintive till "Victory."
8. Hurry till "The Death of Lord Nelson."
9. Plaintive till close.

(The first three numbers are from Bendix suite of four.)

Working the Sound Effects.

By Clyde Martin.

THERE is such a vast scope when it comes to working sound effects that no set rules can or ever will be made that can be followed with exactness. The same condition prevails in working sound effects that we find in music for the picture. We may have our own idea in regard to playing for a certain scene and then find some musician working the same scene in an entirely different manner with just as good or better results. In "playing the pictures," like any other profession, we can always learn by watching others and you will find it a great benefit to get around once in a while and see what others are doing. The man that is willing to take a tip from someone else is the person who will never lose a job because he has allowed himself to get in a rut.

The greatest care should be used in purchasing of sound effects, as there are so many small concerns in the field manufacturing so-called effects that it is an everyday occurrence for some drummer or manager to get "stung." It is a fact that even among the largest manufacturers you will find that their list is not entirely satisfactory. Possibly one concern will make a better railroad imitation than another; then again we find that some barnyard imitations are more practical than others; so the greatest care should be used in purchasing these supplies. If you intend putting in an outfit of sound effects, just remember that the most expensive goods are the cheapest in the long run, and by once equipping yourself with a practical line, they will last you for years and give satisfaction.

The columns of the Moving Picture World contain a number of advertisements of reliable firms manufacturing sound effects, chimes, etc., and they will be pleased to send a catalog to anyone interested in this line.

There are a number of good effects that can be built in your theater at a small cost, and in my next article I will give a description of this line, but where you find an effect listed by a reliable concern it is usually advisable to buy it, as you get the benefit of the other man's experience.

I recently had the pleasure of visiting one of the leading picture houses in the northern part of Missouri and was pleased to see that the management had nerve enough to equip the house with a complete line of effects, but owing to the following knock I will not mention the name of the theater or the town. This manager had undoubtedly spent a large piece of change to secure such an outfit, as he had one of the best lines I have ever seen in a picture theater; but the worst of it was he had about eight or ten small boys back of the screen to work the effects and I wish you could have heard the botched-up affair they were making of it. The chances are that the only compensation the boys got for their "work (?)" was to see the picture from behind the screen, and they ruined the entire program. This same exhibitor could have hired one good man and got a great deal more satisfaction than he did with his army of kids.

It is true that a drummer can handle a great many effects, but the drummer cannot be supposed to take care of all of them. If there is not a competent person on the job a scene can easily be ruined and your sound effects will prove a detriment instead of a boost to the theater.

If there is a shot in the picture, the effect cannot be worked a second before or a second after the scene, but must be there to a dot. If a pane of glass is broken in the scene and the crash is not heard until after the scene is over, it makes a joke of the house and ruins the efforts of the manufacturers, the musician, and all others trying to make a success of the entertainment.

The use of a crash box is very bad in working effects. I have always made it a rule, if a fire scene is shown where window panes are broken, to use large pieces of glass and get the desired effect by breaking same with a heavy mallet. A crash box in such scenes is out of the question.

We are continually reading letters and arguments on the sound effect question and some of the arguments seem very reasonable, but we must take into consideration that there is just as much room for argument on the sound effect subject as there is in the music end of the picture business. We all have our own ideas and it is natural for a person to stand up for his own side, but I think the time is near when the knockers on sound effects will see their mistake and soon will consider this new subject the same as they do the music.

One of the greatest drawbacks to working appropriate sound effects, the same as with the musical end, is that few of the workers ever have a chance to see the pictures until they are thrown on the screen for the approval of the public, and this is one of the biggest handicaps that we have to contend with.

There is little excuse for the sound effect man to miss cues after once seeing a picture and if the manager will just consider the small cost of running over the program in the morning for the benefit of the sound effect people and musicians, he will soon notice a great improvement in their work.

In the September issue of the Moving Picture World is a letter from Mr. Emmett Campbell Hall offering a suggestion that the exhibitors let their audience vote on the popularity of sound effects in the theater. It would be just as reasonable to let them vote on whether a Powers machine should be used or a Motiograph. If the audiences were to vote on some of the musicians and sound effect people that are holding down jobs in certain picture theaters, I believe there would be many people out of work.

Sound effects as well as the music should be handled by capable people, otherwise the work makes a joke of the entertainment, so the audience would not be voting on sound effects but on the person operating them, which, in nine cases out of ten would make a very one-sided vote.

You may all have your opinion as to the effectiveness and importance of sound effects, but for my own part I am a strong believer in them and have often softened the music through certain scenes that the sound effects may be brought out stronger on the scene, and I have always found that they have met with the approval of the audience.

It is very easy to over-do effects in the desire to catch all cues, yet the seemingly unreasonable effects are often the ones that make the hit of the evening. The audience has been educated to expect the sound of horses' hoofs, the splash of water, and the sound of the passing railroad train. But you give them a decided novelty when you let them hear the click of the typewriter when the stenographer is shown in the broker's office. Such details as this may sound very unreasonable to those who have never tried such effects, but take a tip from me and just try it once and I am sure you will agree with me that such details are valuable to your evening's entertainment.

As far as possible, your effects and traps should be concealed; never let the audience "get next" to anything you are working, leave them in the dark as much as possible and they will always appreciate your efforts. Sound effects, with the audience, are like alarm clocks with small boys: when they have seen the works, all of the novelty is gone.

No outfit of traps is complete without a telegraph instrument, as there is hardly a week passes that some producer does not put out a picture showing the tapping of wires, or the interior of a railway station. The telegraph instrument should always be connected and ready for use. I once had a piano player tell me that he did not think a telegraph instrument should be used, as there were often telegraph operators in the audience and it would be quite a joke with them. My answer to this "wise one" was, if that was the case he should never touch a piano, for the reason that oftentimes real musicians would visit the theater where he was working. He offered no more suggestions.

Another valuable addition to the picture theater effects is a set of cathedral chimes. Chimes are constantly needed during the showing of religious pictures and monastery scenes. The chimes, you will find, give tone to any picture of this nature and there is hardly a program that will not call for them.

I would be very glad to receive suggestions from anyone interested in sound effects, if you have found something new in this line, just pass it along and I am sure the readers of The World will appreciate your ideas in this new branch of the business.

F. R. Kramer, of the firm of Kramer & Talbert, Galena, Ill., owners of the Dreamland Theater, was in Chicago last week and arranged for advance bookings with the G. F. Co.'s branch at 117 N. Dearborn St.

A. D. Flintom and Solon Toothaker were in Chicago last week. Mr. Flintom stated that business in the branch offices of the General Film Co., at St. Louis and Kansas City, is highly satisfactory. Mr. Toothaker is a member of the St. Louis staff.

The Song and the Singer

BY CLARENCE E. SINN

ONE doesn't have to take anybody's word that the coming season will be a busy one for the music publishers. A visit to their offices will furnish the most convincing proof that the busy season is here right now. Up in the Majestic Theater building (Chicago), where are located the splendid rooms of Jerome H. Remick & Co.'s Chicago branch, I found the singers and performers standing at the counters three deep waiting to be made happy by genial "Billy" Thompson (Mr. Remick's representative) or his able staff of assistants. Billy was handling the crowd as easily as a ticket taker at a circus and seemed to enjoy it. He rests from midnight until two o'clock in the morning and spends half that time practicing the deaf and dumb alphabet so he can talk to three people at once. Among the best sellers of the Remick catalogue at the present minute are "Oceana Roll," "Hula Hula Love," "You'll Do the Same Thing Over Again," "Red Rose Rag," and "Oh! You Beautiful Doll." The Last is the newest; I won't say it is the best, but believe me, Mauruss, there is some class to that song. Just wait till you hear it. Or, better still, get it. The Loos Brothers are taking encores every performance at the Orpheum Theater on that song this week, and you know what that means during the busy hours of a moving picture theater.

The Loos Brothers (Ernie and Billie) are among the most popular boosters of the Jerome H. Remick staff. They have just signed for a five weeks' engagement at the Orpheum, after returning from Milwaukee, where they were on the bill at the opening of the "Butterfly Theater," week of September 3d. They were full of praise for this beautiful new theater and Manager Meister as well. Capacity 1,500 (I mean the theater, not the manager), eight pieces in the orchestra for the night shows and four for the day. Also a pipe organ, which was installed at considerable cost. Others on the bill at this opening were Maud Webb, Ollie Westermann and Signore Bosley.

Sid Lachman is singing "Ocena Roll," "Red Rose Rag," and "Oh, You Beautiful Doll" at the Willard Theater this week.

Bennett Malloy is out at Fort Madison, Iowa, handing out Remick hits at the Grand Opera House and making friends I hear; also making good.

The corner of State and Monroe streets is called "The Busy Corner." "Busy" is right, but it never was a really truly busy corner until Ted Snyder camped there. He has taken a fraction of 28th Street and set it down right in the heart of our otherwise quiet town and then calls our attention to "The Land of Harmony." I found the crowd spilling clear down the stairs and onto the street, got mixed up in the jam and for awhile didn't know whether I was going up or coming down. Found a force of workmen making alterations and putting in more partitions to increase the number of piano rooms. They have seven of these at present and all working every minute. The Ted Snyder Company moved in its present quarters six months ago and is rapidly outgrowing them. Indeed, to a casual observer it looks as if the business was already too big for its clothes, but as I have no authority to say so I won't mention it. Manager Clark calls your attention to a couple of pippins—"Mysterious Rag" and "After the Honeymoon." These two numbers bid fair to become as popular as "Alexander's Ragtime Band," and you couldn't say anything stronger if you tried.

LOOS BROTHERS
Of the Jerome H. Remick Staff.

Miss Ella Jacobson, "That Popular Band Singer," is still with the Ted Snyder forces. She is at present singing with Paul Smith's Seventh Regimental Band for the Municipal Congress session at the Coliseum (Chicago), 18 to 20, after which she goes to the Butterfly Theater, Milwaukee.

At Will Rossiter's (160 W. Lake and 123 N. Clark streets) I found the same busy drama being enacted—everybody up to the neck in work and looking happy. Will Rossiter is known all over the civilized world and Greater New York as "The Chicago Publisher," but in private life he is called the great Original Hustler. I remember when they used to call him "the Boy Wonder," but that was several "yars" ago, yet though he may have lost a small fraction of his youth, he is still a wonder. He writes and composes songs and instrumental music while he is resting, is one of the largest music publishers in the business (to say nothing of the song books, joke books, and I don't know how many other kinds of books incidental to the trade), manages and directs this gigantic business, sings in the Will Rossiter Trio and teaches the young idea how to boost. The only thing that is keeping him so thin is fretting because there are only twenty-four hours in the day. Gee, but he's a happy guy, looking to the pill tomorrow.

Will Rossiter has put as many hot liners across the plate as the next one and his batting average is 'way up close to the top. Among his present best sellers are: "Carolina Rag," "Let's Make Love While the Moon Shines," "Somewhere This Summer With You," "When I Woke Up This Morning," and "Love Me, Let the World Go By." Some of the Will Rossiter singers are distributed as follows: Joe Marshall at the Erie Theater (Swartz, manager); Miss Bess Stokes, Sheridan Theater (Franke, manager), Irving Park Boulevard; Ted Ullmark, Central Theater (Compton, manager), Austin; Miss Ethel Barney, Lyceum Theater (Fred Linnick, manager), 39th and Cottage Grove Ave.; Bob Dailey, California Theater (Franke, manager), 26th and Trumbull (all of Chicago, Ill.); John Baxter ("The Man Behind the Voice"), at Coney Island, N. Y. John's title is no idle boast either. He has about the biggest good voice in the business and I shouldn't wonder if you could hear his songs from Coney Island to Madison Square on a clear day.

Maud Webb, who was on the opening bill at the Butterfly, Milwaukee, was held over for two additional weeks. Manager Meister evidently can appreciate an artist, and Miss Webb comes under that head. Rocco Vocco is on the Chas. K. Harris forces and making good with "Don't Blame Me" and "I Miss You, Honey, Miss You All the Time." Sam. Hermann is at the Butterfly (Milwaukee). Miss Edna Shephard, the popular contralto, is pleasing her old friends and making many new ones at the Orpheum Theater (Chicago). Prideaux and Howard, of the firm of Leo Fiest, have dissolved partnership. Mr. Howard opens September 25 for Bernard & Cacum, Palace Theater, Macon, Ga., for a four weeks' run. Mr. Prideaux will remain in Chicago territory indefinitely.

The Western Film Exchange of New York has filed suit against Ernest Brown, of Plattsburg, N. Y., to secure the return of one of their reels, which it is claimed the defendant has retained without right. The defendant has filed a counter suit.

CHICAGO LETTER.

By Jas. S. McQuade.

DURING a conversation with an exhibitor one day last week, I learned that he had been using vaudeville with his pictures throughout the summer. I was particularly surprised at this, as he had always been a firm believer in an exclusive picture program.

Asking the reason for the change in his business policy, I was still more surprised at the answer, "I could not help it. I was forced to run vaudeville."

Now how was he forced? you ask, just as I asked him.

The answer is, indeed, pitiable. This man was forced because his competitor used vaudeville! That was not the right answer, as I afterward showed him. He wanted to get rich quick and he had an overweening ambition to be a showman, as if it does not require more brains and considerably more of the true showman's ability and instinct to run a picture show successfully than is required to supervise a bunch of "ham fats!"

This exhibitor had to admit that he lost over two thousand dollars during the summer by his little experiment! Now he vows that nothing can ever again tempt him to mix pictures with cheap vaudeville.

I know exhibitors in Chicago who also admit this question of being forced to use vaudeville, but I have failed to find one of them who has yet tested an exclusive picture program against his near competitor's mixed program. Why this fear? The exhibitor who stands for straight pictures is bound to get the best grade of customers. And they will stand by him. Nor will his attendance diminish, if he is a live advertiser. Indeed, the chances are all on the side of his having an increased patronage, and that many of his new patrons will be drawn from the competing house that has cheap vaudeville. If the competing house charges 10 cents admission, because of the addition of vaudeville, then let the other house increase the quality of its picture service and also charge 10 cents.

Why not try it, you doubting Thomas? Be fair to the picture and give it a show.

A Martyr To His Cause."

Well known labor leaders from different parts of the country have taken part in the production of "A Martyr To His Cause," a film which treats of the arrest and alleged kidnapping of John J. McNamara, of Indianapolis. The net profits of the exhibitors will be devoted to a defense fund for McNamara and his associates, who are being tried at Los Angeles on the charge of being connected with the dynamiting of the Los Angeles Times Building.

Mrs. McNamara, wife of the labor leader, his children, and the friends and relatives who were present at the time of his arrest by Detective William J. Burns, of Chicago, appear in the picture.

The Essanay Company has made the film, which at first was under consideration by the American Film Manufacturing Company.

An Associated Press dispatch, from Los Angeles, dated September 23, reads as follows:

"The California Indians cannot understand why their race is always depicted on the moving picture screen in war paint, while in reality they are now engaged in the peaceful pursuit of farming," said W. H. Stanley, superintendent of the Southern California Indian reservation.

"The Indian of today will spend his last cent on a moving picture show when he visits the city," Stanley continued. "I have known of several, both bucks and squaws, who have visited every moving picture show in town before they returned home, but nevertheless, they were loud in their complaints of what they termed 'the white man's injustice.'

"We are trying to teach the Indian that he should be a good farmer and forget about being a warrior, and when he visits the city and sees nothing but the Indian depicted with gun or arrow in his hands, instead of a hoe or rake, he becomes sadly confused, and the better educated among them are deeply grieved."

Chicago Film Brevities.

Owing to the ramming of the "S. S. Olympic" in European waters on her way to New York, having on board films for George Kleine, certain corrections were necessary for the forthcoming Gaumont releases. Following is the corrected schedule of Gaumont releases: Tuesday, October 3, "The Missing Bracelet," or "Jimmie Unjustly Accused;" Saturday, October 7, "Pansies," a colored subject; approximate length 155 feet; also on the same reel "Rejected," a drama about 845 feet; Tuesday, October 10, "Ajaccio, Birthplace of Napoleon," length 318 feet; also on the same reel "Jimmie's Midnight Flight;" Saturday, October 14, "Cintra, a Picturesque Town of Portugal," length 236 feet; also on the same reel "The Upward Way," a colored subject, 764 feet in length. All previous advices regarding release dates of these films are to be ignored by exhibitors.

The Municipal Congress and Exposition, now in its second week at the Coliseum, is offering moving pictures as the chief side entertainment. Fire tugs in operation and the building of streets and roads are some of the pictures shown in black and white. The Kinemacolor views of the "Coronation of George V" are also a strong feature.

A. M. Kennedy, manager of the American Film Mfg. Company, returned from his visit to the Western stock company in California, Tuesday Sept. 19.

Maurice Fleckles, manager of the Laemmle Exchange, this city, left for New York, Tuesday, Sept. 26, on a short visit.

The police of Elgin, Ill., hold moving pictures responsible for the hold-up of a 13-year-old girl by two 10-year-old boy bandits, of that city, who robbed her of 25 cents. The girl was on her way to a grocery store, on an errand for her mother, when she was held up. What a convenient hobby-horse the moving picture has grown to be for officers of the law.

The Humboldt Theater, at 851 Ohio Street, this city, had its balcony closed last week by an inspector until certain exits will have been made therefrom, in conformity with the building ordinance. The daily press, in mentioning the incident, stated that the theater was closed. Another instance of the discrimination practiced against the picture theater.

C. S. Sullivan, general manager of the Royal Theater Company, with headquarters in Hancock, Mich., was a visitor on Saturday, Sept. 23. The company owns a circuit of five theaters in Escanaba, Hancock, Calumet, Laurium and Ishpeming, all in Michigan. Manager Sullivan looks for a very prosperous fall season.

Mr. Miller, business agent of Local No. 2, has advised me that the initiation fee for the operators' union will be $50, starting October 15. Twenty-five dollars of this amount will be paid down when application is made. The former initiation fee was $25, five dollars of which was paid down on application. The raise is due to the fact that some operators were taking advantage of having paid their application fee, in order to induce managers of theaters to employ them.

George H. Heiser, of Heiser & Finke, who own the Star Theater, in Dayton, Ohio, was in Chicago on business last week. They have just sold the Jewel Theater, in Troy, Ohio. Mr. Heiser is an experienced and well-known showman, having been with Ringling Bros. for over ten years. He also managed the White City in Dayton, Ohio, for a year. Mr. Heiser uses Independent service, and he was looking for feature subjects during his stay here. He also made a round of the theaters in the city in order to gain points for the improvement of the Star. He is a regular reader and a firm friend of the Moving Picture World. Not even the ads escape him, and he states that he reads every one in the paper.

John Berscheit, owner of the Century Theater, Mishawaka, Ind., and his manager, George Singer, were visitors last week. They are patrons of the G. F. Co.'s branch at 429 S. Wabash, and arranged for special and feature films for the next three weeks. Mr. Berscheit is very well pleased with his business.

Manager Van Ronkel states that his new business, taken on for the last two weeks, has been larger in volume than at any time during his experience in the rental business. He gives as the cause the superiority of the service offered.

W. O. Stevens, owner of the Star Theater, Princeton, Ill., was in the city for a day last week. He reports business very satisfactory.

James K. O'Neill, owner of the Star Theater, Henry, Ill., paid a flying visit to the city one day last week. The fall business has opened with a rush, so Manager O'Neill states.

R. S. Hopper, owner of the Lyric Theater, Freeport, Ill., was a visitor last week and reports that he will open three more houses in that section of the State in the near future.

L. H. Frank, owner of the Halsted Theater, 6202 S. Halsted Street, was seen last week at the G. F. Co.'s branch, 429 S. Wabash. He informed me that he will feature specially "The Two Orphans" on Thursday, Sept. 28. Mr. Frank is well pleased with his box office receipts.

Mr. Whitcomb, of the Jones O'Brien Amusement Company, who have theaters in Fond du Lac, Oshkosh, and Sheboygan, all in Wisconsin, was in the city last week and arranged for special bookings with the G. F. Co.'s branch, at 17 S. Wabash. He stated that business was very good.

Manager F. C. Aiken, of the G. F. Co.'s branch, at 17 S. Wabash, states that he has taken on a large volume of new business during the week past. Mr. Aiken states that a steady increase has been shown every week since the releases were increased to 3.

Charles Vance, owner of Dreamland, Streator, Ill., opened his new house, the Dawn, Monday, Sept. 25. The name of this theater was chosen from a list of town names suggested by patrons and people in the surrounding country. The Dawn is a beautiful house, the front and interior decorations being placed by the Decorators' Supply Company, of this city.

H. J. Mitchell, owner of the Majestic Theater, LaGrange, Ind., was in the city last week, and arranged with Manager Aiken, at the G. F. Co.'s branch, 17 S. Wabash, for an extra service, for the week commencing October 2. That week we'll be a gala one in La Grange, as the yearly corn carnival will be in full blast. Farmers for fifty miles around come into town for the occasion and usually remain the entire week.

Messrs. Conway and Allen, of Woodstock, Ill., have secured a lease of the Gem Theater, which was formerly run by A. J. Loewenthal. Licensed service from the G. F. Co.'s branch, at 17 S. Wabash, will be continued.

J. S. Quirk, owner of the Olympia Theaters in Arcola and Tuscola, Ill., was in the city last week and arranged for a higher priced service with the G. F. Co.'s branch, at 17 S. Wabash. Mr. Quirk reports that his receipts are much larger than at the same time last year. Mr. Quirk is cashier of the chief bank in Arcola.

AN AIRDOME IN A SMALL SUBURBAN VILLAGE.

Messrs. McGrath and Ranko report fair business all summer at their airdome at Dobbs Ferry, N. Y., a Hudson River village about twenty-one miles from New York City. They selected a vacant lot on the main street of the village, which numbers about 3,000 population, and projected five reels every evening, weather permitting, to an audience of about 300 patrons, at ten cents admission. A representative of the Moving Picture World called at the airdome one evening last week and spent several very pleasant minutes before the show talking with Mr. Ranko, who was in charge. It was plain that he thoroughly understood the picture-play business. He said that the summer's venture at Dobbs Ferry had netted a fair return, but was not over-enthusiastic. The company runs two larger houses, one in Mt. Vernon, N. Y., and one in Manhattan, which with no more trouble give greater returns.

After talking a few minutes, Mr. Ranko excused himself. His operator was not there that night and he had to be both manager and operator. The operating room was in a little tower built just off the sidewalk, and the stone retaining wall of the Old Croton Aqueduct, about 120 feet back, served as backing for the curtain. It was a good long throw, but the projection was almost perfect. The pictures were well chosen. There were two Pathes, a Lubin, a Biograph and an Essanay—all old pictures interesting, human and well photographed. They were clear and without shadows and almost as steady as a church. The audience enjoyed the program thoroughly, reading the leaders aloud and at the comedies making appreciative comments that added to the fun. One of the Pathes was that fine picture, "The Stepsisters." Pearl White came in for quite an ovation, as did William Walthall. The pathos of the Biograph picture, "The Broken Doll," seemed to affect them deeply, and well it might, for it is a worthy picture. The World's representative was able to congratulate Mr. Ranko very sincerely.

AMAZING SITUATION IN MACON

Amusement Lovers of Georgia Town Prefer Pictures to Vulgar Farce—All Musicians Playing for Pictures

That why the motion picture has been leaping and bounding into popular favor has seldom been clearly stated by the newspapers of the country. The Moving Picture World has claimed a well defined reason for some time, but it has failed to find a corroboration in the correspondence from outside sources. The information comes through The World's correspondent at Macon, Ga., and will prove pleasant reading for picture makers.

On September 6th the Grand Opera House, leased by Lubliner Brothers, opened the season with that sensational Broadway success, "The Girl from Rector's." The business of the management commenced when it was found impossible to obtain enough attractions to compose a suitable orchestra. Without going into the reasons from theaters become exceedingly stupid, and that is just what the newspaper critics said of her the next day, along with other uncomplimentary remarks about the character of dramatic productions offered in that town and advising it is what is necessary to attract the public from the picture theaters.

The trouble about getting an orchestra arose from the fact that Macon's picture shows are giving steady employment to all the musicians in town at prices far better than the legitimate house has ever paid and better than it feels disposed to pay now. This means that traveling attractions playing Macon, Ga., will be obliged to carry an orchestra. Such is the power of the pictures.

How the people of Macon view the matter is well told by the local newspapers. Here are some extracts from what they said:

(From the Macon Daily Telegraph.)

That from one; now for the next, from the Macon Telegraph:

And finally this editorial observation from The News:

WHAT IS TO BE THE FATE OF THE LEGITIMATE DRAMA?

Is the moving picture to supplant the spoken word on the stage?

Is the stage to be merged in with the silent art of motion or will the two live and grow side by side?

Are the managers of the new theaters to change to meet the demands of the times or will they continue to pay big salaries to stars of the past and have empty houses?

Are the stars to become all dumb? Somebody has been asking these questions.

Is the moving picture show to prove the enemy to conventional entertainment, or to destroy it?

For a year or more the moving picture shows have been growing and growing until now there are no fewer than fifty-three of them in the United States, and the number is added to almost every week. Some of the most successful men in the country are interested in them, and they are crowded with a discriminating clientele everywhere and without even ence will remain with the picture shows.

the customary and traditional aid of orchestral music and accompaniment?

For a number of seasons past the theatrical attractions given to Macon and indeed the entire southern circuit had been steadily and noticeably degenerating. The explanation was offered that the business had fallen into the hands of a trust. It culminated in an alleged fight against the trust resulting, as we were led to believe, in a victory for competition, and the independents, and, beginning with the present season, we were promised a better and more varied line of attractions.

In the meantime the moving picture shows have sprung into existence, giving the people a cheap and popular form of attraction. They have grown and flourished and become the rage to an unprecedented degree, and the trust which a year or two years ago seemed to have a strangle-hold on the old standard form of drama has apparently been knocked out and lost its grip more completely than any possible competition in the legitimate could have brought about.

Such is the situation as we see it, but what is the answer?

Surely the histrionic art is not dead. Surely the voice of the gallery god is not silenced for aye, no more to give the signal for applause or condemnation, to make and unmake the reputations of the footlight favorites who strive before him for the verdict that makes or undoes them quite.

No, it cannot be. The devotees of Thespis will rehabilitate themselves. They will revive and recreate their beloved art. They will come again to reassure and delight the lovers of the legitimate. There will always be those who cannot be satisfied and diverted with the pantomime of the picture shows. But these can no longer be amused with cheap knockabout comedies, leg shows and threadbare themes.

The revival of the drama, we verily believe, is indispensable, but it must be complete and unquestioned.

There you have a plain, unvarnished statement of the situation. The result is the overshadowing popularity of the picture theater. What is happening in Macon is happening in every city in the United States. For the picture manufacturer it teaches the oft-repeated truth that the public will not stand for the vulgar in its menu of pleasure. What the ligitimate theater has lost because it disregarded that truth the picture theater has gained because its entertainment is clean.

Our correspondent adds that since the departure of "The Girl from Rector's" the Grand has been crowding its capacity with Dante's Inferno and Kinemacolor—pictures of the highest class.

NOTABLE EVENT FILMED.

The Last Parade of the G. A. R. at Rochester, Which Will Be Witnessed with Much Interest.

It is a regrettable fact that the ranks of the Grand Army of the Republic are thinning each year and at each National Encampment the attendance has been smaller. The last encampment held at Rochester, N. Y., marked an epoch in the history of the order for on that occasion the last grand parade was held. This has been decided upon owing to the fact that the survivors of the Civil War are becoming feeble, bowed with the weight of years. The long march has been a severe tax on their strength and it was decided to abandon the pageant. Owing to this fact the parade was a large one, every veteran who could march being in line. There were something over 25,000 of them proudly keeping step to the inspiring music, and when the streets had been traversed there were many tired old soldiers.

This parade was filmed by Imp photographers and they obtained some excellent pictures. The film will be released October 9 and will prove very interesting to all students of history, as it was reviewed by President Taft and the Department officers of the G. A. R. The scenes were taken from the most advantageous positions to bring out the most prominent scenes, and the film is pronounced by critics to be excellent both in photography and subject matter.

WISCONSIN EXHIBITORS ORGANIZE.

At a meeting at the Plankington Hotel in Milwaukee, September 19, a State organization of moving picture exhibitors was perfected and a membership of sixty was enrolled from all parts of the State. When details are perfected the league intends to affiliate with the National League of Exhibitors of America. There were several subsequent meetings, followed by a banquet and an auto ride about the city. The officers elected are as follows: Charles H. Phillips, Milwaukee, president; vice-presidents, Thomas Foster, Stanley, and Charles W. Christianson, Racine; secretary, J. W. Clarke, Sheboygan; treasurer, Henry S. Klein, Milwaukee; sergeant, Peter Jermain, Milwaukee; trustees, B. K. Fischer, O. Sprecher, Milwaukee; L. W. Anderson, Neenah, and C. W. Tiede, Burlington.

The members were addressed by Mayor Seidel, who praised their efforts.

"The theater is one of the recognized educators of the people," said the Mayor, "and the motion picture house is the educator of the masses. Anything that you can do to raise the standard of morals of the people through raising the character of the exhibits in these places, is doing a great and lasting public service and will prove a benefit to your business."

Carl Rungel, assistant building inspector, also addressed the meeting, requesting the proprietors to consult with the building code commission in an effort to establish a style of safety devices for the protection of patrons of picture show houses.

OPERATORS' LAW UNCONSTITUTIONAL.

Justice Gavegan So Decides in Gibelman Case—"Unreasonable and Unnecessary."

Supreme Court Justice Gavegan, in a decision made public on Wednesday, which was rendered in the case of Lewis Gibelman, who was refused an examination as to his fitness to operate a moving picture apparatus by Commissioner Thompson, of the Department of Water Supply, Gas and Electricity, of the City of New York, declared that the new law is unreasonable and unnecessary to protect the health, morals or general welfare of the State.

The new law, which Justice Gavegan practically declares unconstitutional, is known as Chapter 252 of the laws of 1911. It provides that before a license could be given to the operator of a moving picture apparatus, the applicant must first show that he has served a six months' apprenticeship with a licensed operator. It was this clause that is declared unreasonable by Justice Gavegan. Gibelman has operated moving picture apparatus outside of New York City for four years and when he applied to Commissioner Thompson for an examination as to his fitness of a New York City license that official refused to grant the examination because Gibelman could not show that he had served a six months' apprenticeship with a licensed New York operator.

It was decided by Anson Burlingame Cole, counsel for the applicant, to make a test case out of the circumstances surrounding the application of Gibelman. Previously Mr. Cole had a case where Commissioner Thompson had refused to license operators who underwent the city examination, but were refused licenses because they could not show that they served a six months' apprenticeship. In that case Justice Ford, of the Supreme Court, compelled Commissioner Thompson to issue the license, and following that decision some 80 men were given the privilege to operate moving picture apparatus. Subsequently, however, when Gibelman applied for a license he was refused the privilege of an examination by the commissioner and the case presented features that could be used to test the law.

Accordingly a motion was made by Mr. Cole to Justice Gavegan, in the Supreme Court, a few weeks ago, the details of which were fully told in the Moving Picture World, for a peremptory writ of mandamus directing Henry S. Thompson, as Commissioner of Water Supply, Gas and Electricity, of the City of New York, to examine Gibelman for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not he is competent to operate moving picture apparatus and its connections in the City of New York.

Mr. Cole stated, after the decision was rendered, that any moving picture operator can now apply to Commissioner Thompson for an examination and that that official must examine the applicant and issue a license if found competent without regard to the six months' apprenticeship clause. He also said that an applicant need not be a citizen of the United States in order to qualify for an examination.

Education and Science

$30,000,000 FOR NEW YORK SCHOOLS.

The vast sum of money required by the Board of Education for the schools of Greater New York is perhaps the largest ever asked for by a single board. When to this is added the cost of private and parochial schools (the one must nearly approach fifty millions per annum). The old cry of "a schoolhouse in every village" is drowned now by "a State supervised education for every child" on the soil of the United States. Of what interest is this to the readers of the Moving Picture World? Simply this, that by authority of law, everyone of these millions of children will shortly be compelled to learn by aid of the moving picture.

In this last budget of the New York Board provision is made for the "procuring of cinematographic apparatus for use in the schools."

Now, the law keeps children away from the moving picture show, soon the law will compel them to attend the moving picture school, and sad to admit, the fact stares us in the face the moving picture film producers are in no degree ready for this great trade which is shortly to be thrown upon them. Millions of people between the ages of 5 and 25 years making the picture a part of their curriculum and no preparation even in the distant future for them. A close scrutiny of all the educational pictures issued to date shows that a proportion of less than 25 per cent. are available for scholastic use, and these are only fragmentary; there are none serial in character. The manufacturer truly says he is "not making educational pictures," he is "catering only for amusement." This may be very true and we may be expecting too much from them; they can no more issue an educational series of pictures than a newspaper or dramatic journal can publish a set of school text books.

To produce educational pictures requires such a staff that certainly cannot be found in any present-day "factory," neither can they be manipulated to bring about the results; it requires a new beginning from bottom up. But, will the necessary pictures be forthcoming? Certainly, the schools will have them in the same way that they have everything else; they are as sure for the children as next week's bread. If this is the case, who will provide them? As in other things authorities, states, governments wait to buy what they need, what they cannot buy they make.

It will not be very long before there are well equipped educational film producing plants in central localities over the United States. Public money is always ready for public good. New York will vote its $30,000,000 without "turning a hair" and if necessary a million would be a small matter for a factory properly manned for the production of films that will be masterpieces, especially so because they will be subject to no such limitations as those which now hamper the private firm. We are on the verge of the greatest advance ever made in any science and the entire transformation of applied cinematography which will rob the present-day producers of their wisdom and beauty. Is this a pity? Are makers of to-day anxious or glad? Do they wish this great trade, or do they despise it?

THE WATER BEETLE.

One of the best natural history pictures issued by Pathe is the Water Beetle, this when enlarged becomes a very unpleasant "animal," even to the point of repulsiveness on account of its pugnacious attitude toward its fellows. In the larva state it is perhaps more dangerous than when full-grown, as the pictures show it attacking animate objects larger than itself. An excellent battle between a larva and a lizard five times its size shows its bitterness; securing a "bite" on some vital spot the lizard may writhe and wriggle, but cannot shake off this vicious little enemy.

It is a good microscopic insight into the water world which is interesting.

Three thousand feet of moving pictures dealing with the experiences of the famous Fred Stone, of the Montgomery & Stone Company, in a recent expedition to Greenland, have been taken. The pictures show Stone (in Mr. Stone shooting and capturing polar bears.

"THE SNARE OF SOCIETY" (Lubin).

This recent film by the Lubin Co. is worthy of special praise; may it deserve commendation for its splendid attack upon one of the most dangerous social evils of the times. That viper of "Bridge Whist" which has crippled the financial condition and stained the moral purity of thousands of young society girls, and turned many matrons into scheming gamblers, receives a most deserved exposure and perhaps a death blow in this excellent portrayal.

The story revolves around a well to do young couple: the young wife has been drawn into the social swim, while the husband remains domesticated. Arriving home one afternoon, he begins to admire a beautiful ring he has purchased for his wife, when he sees the invitation to the "function" lying on the table. Going to his wife's room he finds her dressing for the occasion, presents her with the ring, which she receives with proper appreciation; when, however, he appeals to her to stay at home with him she indignantly refuses. Society "friends," who are always experts in the game looking for prey, call for her and without even proper adieus she leaves her husband and goes with them.

At the game she is evidently a novice amid experts. She is easily fleeced, losing all the time, until her money is gone. Leaving the table with mingled feelings of disappointment and anger she is followed to the hall by her gentleman opponent, whose vest pocket is bulging with her losses. His persuadings are unavailing and she goes home.

While sitting disconsolately at home, she suddenly remembers that her husband has money in a secret bureau safe of which she knows the combination. Hastily helping herself, she returns to the party. What a sad picture—a beautiful young wife so suddenly changed into a thief and a gambler—a picture known to the writer to be sadly too true. The well-to-do towns of the United States are filled with this evil octopus in society.

Alone and again she home again all is quiet. How has this butterfly of a tender domestic clime resist the ensnaring net which her winning "friends" set for her? Crestfallen, crushed, she leaves the table again; the same gentleman follows her to the hall begging her return; she is too valuable for them not to flatter. She speaks of her great losses, which he offers to make good by producing the roll of winnings from his pocket. If he makes any terms, one can only conjecture what they are. She repulses him, ultimately offering her ring as security for a loan she receives. Hastening home, she begins to redeem herself by replacing the stolen money. At his club the husband overhears a young man boasting of being in possession of a lady's rings. When the name is whispered, it is that of his own wife, whereupon he promptly floors the supposed calumniator with a blow. Upon going home, he finds the story sadly true. A strained home where otherwise joy reigned is the result. The young wife evidently determines upon satisfaction. Taking a revolver in her reticule, she goes to the home of the holder of her rings to obtain them "at any cost." He proposes to "cut cards" for them and, for the first time, she wins. She takes them home and gives them to her husband. The society friends call again with blandishments to invite the young matron to another bridge-whist. With rare courage she declines, causing the friends to depart with cold, haughty looks and proudly raised heads. Meanwhile, the husband has been watching from behind the screen. He compliments his wife upon her change and together they appreciate more than the joy of that domesticity which is free from the yoke of society. Ladies are to be congratulated upon the courage with which they have handled this great strong theme in American homes. A greater moral lesson has never appeared on the screen.

SHOW US THE GIRL WHO HELPS MOTHER.

Why not give us a few moving pictures of the girl who helps mother? They are worth more than the Nan Pattersons, the Evelyn Thaws and the Sarah Bernhardts, and appeal to nothing but morbid curiosity and a taste for tragedy or depravity. Why don't the film makers pay big prices to the real heroines to pose for human interest pictures?—Washington Star.

Projection Department

Edited by F. H. RICHARDSON

Union Wanted.—Connecticut (name of town suppressed) writes: "Kindly advise me as to whether or not there is an operators' union in this state or has there ever been any attempt made to organize one?"

I have no record of an operator's union in Connecticut, though there may be one. The I. A. T. S. E. has not seen fit to supply us with complete list of operators' unions, though questions of this kind are being propounded every once in a while. It would be distinctly to their interest to do so and the matter is up to them.

Unions.—It is perhaps advisable that we say a few words to exhibitors regarding the matter of operators' unions at this time.

Many exhibitors who have made no study of economic conditions and who see in the organization of labor nothing but a club to be used against them are honestly opposed to unions and stand ready to do all in their power to oppose them. Just a comparatively few years ago, within the writer's memory, practically all employers were of the same mind and held precisely the same view. Today, however, there are thousands of employers paying the highest labor scales in America who would not go back to the old conditions if they could. They have, much to their surprise, while obliged to pay two and, in some instances, three times the wage of former days, besides reducing hours of labor from ten and twelve to eight, found that not only did they suffer no monetary loss through advanced wages, but actually disrivered benefit by reason of improved conditions brought about through the organization of the men.

That the unions at times work injustice, just as do the employers themselves, may not be denied. No important movement in the world's history was ever accomplished without mistakes being made and injustice being worked in individual cases. However, the writer firmly believes that the organization of labor is in every way beneficial to the employer as well as to the men themselves.

Low salary, other things being equal, attracts only men of mediocre ability, utterly incapable, as a rule, of doing high-class work. Medium salaries get better men, while high salaries procure the best there is. In the operating room, upon the work of which depends the income of all capital invested, we need the best to be had in the way of projection knowledge and skill. This cannot be procured by paying salaries which will attract only men of second rate ability. That is as plain as the statement that one and one make two.

When the business first started there were, of course, no operators at all. Nevertheless, considering the absolute crudeness of equipment, and almost total lack of projection knowledge and skill, results were surprisingly good. Why? The question is easily answered. From $45.00 to $60.00 per week ,and even more, was offered for men to operate the machines. This attracted high-class men of ability and brains. Men of resource who could reason from cause to effect and get results even under the most trying circumstances. Before long, however, managers got the idea that operating consisted only of ability to twist a crank, and salaries were placed on the toboggan slide, promptly shooting to the very bottom until four or five years ago it was quite possible to get an "operator" at less salary than was paid the commonest kind of common laborer. Meanwhile photography, perforation and equipment had advanced by leaps and bounds, but projection was no better—in fact, it was actually worse than in the very beginning of the business. Again, why? Simply because the men of ability and brains had quit, being able to earn far more money at other things. The operator, taken as a class, had degenerated into an irresponsible, low-paid dub who knew nothing beyond doing as little as he possibly could for the six to fifteen dollars (yes, I said six) handed him in return for his week's work. It was all he was worth, and more. Quite true. The fact was, however, that he had as much business in an operating room as the devil has in Heaven. He was a curse to the business, but a curse brought into existence by the manager himself through following a shortsighted save-a-penny-and-lose-a-dollar policy.

About this time the writer saw the tremendous evil being worked and got busy hammering at the proposition of better projection. He has been at it ever since and intends to keep it up until there is no more need, if ever that time comes. Something like a year later organization of the operators was started and has been gradually progressing and under the combined influence of education and organization the minimum salary has been gradually raised to fifteen dollars in the larger towns and to eighteen in the cities. It has also been pulled upward to some extent in the smaller places, taken as a whole. In some cities a maximum of $35.00 has been reached. The benefit of even this small start has been immense and unquestionably has done much to insure the permanency of the Picture Palace as a form of amusement. With intelligent, resourceful men in the operating rooms, men who are willing to study the finer points of projection, projection is being pulled out of the Land of Shadows and with better shows managers are rightly talking of advancing the price of admission. But the matter has not gone far enough. Neither fifteen, eighteen or even twenty dollars a week will attract the class of men we want in operating rooms, unless they believe there is more in the future. It will require thirty to thirty-five dollars to get what is needed and it must be had. Salaries cannot be advanced to any such figures in a week or a month or even a year, but they must come and with them will come such a show as wlll command 10, 15 and 25 cents admission. My advice to managers is to study this question, co-operate with the unions and grant all their reasonable demands as fast as possible, remembering that in so doing you cast pennies into the sea of business which shall return to you after many days (not so very many either) as dollars. The union is a business institution and must be dealt with as such. It is here to stay, whether you, I or anyone else likes it or does not like it. The wise man recognizes and deals with conditions as they are, regardless of whether he is pleased with those conditions or not. Fighting organization, unless the organization be intrinsically wrong, is like fighting a windmill. You will sooner or later get the worst of it. The operators' union is an institution necessary to the welfare of the business, just as an exhibitors' organization is necessary to its best interests. I advise all operators to get into their organization at once, and I also advise all exhibitors to get into their organization and to stay in it.

A Question.—Wakefield, R. I., writes: "Here is a question in dispute: A says the Fort Wayne Company makes a compensarc which changes A. C. to D. C., known under the same name, viz: Fort Wayne Compensarc. B claims the Fort Wayne Compensarc is a current-saving device and does not change A. C. to D. C. Which is right? I am a constant reader of The World and look for it every Monday on the first mail. I am hardly able to wait for it. I am operating in a pretty little summer theater, seating capacity about 325. The projection is the best I can produce through hard work. We have one of the best piano players in the business. He plays strictly to the picture; also we use a trap drummer who is there with the effects. Mr. Webster, our manager, is one corking good fellow. I have only to ask for supplies to get them. We have a Powers Five and keep an extra mechanism, lamphouse, three sets of condensers and three extra lamps. We never have a breakdown or mis-frame. Have 110 volt A. C. through a Miles Brothers rheostat. Get a good, clear light and always have a clear picture."

As to the argument: the Fort Wayne Compensarc is a low voltage transformer (current saver) and does not change A. C. to D. C. I have been informed that they put out a motor-generator set, which does change A. C. to D. C. also under the name Compensarc.

It is too bad that all operators cannot report their manager as willing to get needed supplies promptly. In too many cases the operator almost has to pry supplies away from the manager (?) with a crowbar. Plenty of supplies, an extra mechanism, lamp, etc., save a world of useless worry, vexatious delays and bad feeling. The operator who will waste supplies because he has plenty of them is not fit to be in an operating room. Such a man, if any there be, ought to be promptly fired. Many managers, however, want a thing used just as long as it will hang together. They consider it waste to do otherwise. This is not economy. It is foolishness, pure and simple. I have seen, for instance, machines come to for repairs on which the inventions' members both were almost entirely gone. In fact, I have seen them at last that I have wondered how on earth they managed to get a film through the machine at all. This was not necessary, nor was the man who ran that house a manager. It is perfect results on the screen that bring money to the box office. Perfect results cannot be had working with a bunch of junk. The operator who has to fight for every cent's worth of supplies is likely to get into an "I-don't-care" frame of mind, and he is not much to be blamed for it, either.

That Auto Outfit.—Payson, Ill., writes: "In answer to your queries in The World, of recent date (p. 250 Sept. 16 issue), will say that the dynamo used on our trip is one made by the Triumph Electric Company, Cincinnati, Ohio. It is a two k. w., 60-volt machine giving 33.2 amperes at 2,000 revolutions. Our auto engine has four cylinders, developing about 35 h.p. It has a long stroke (5½ inches). The flywheel is 16 inches in diameter. The pulley on the connecting shaft is 5½ inches in diameter, making the speed of the engine 2,800 at 440 revolutions per minute. By bringing the engine up to 500 we get very nearly 70 volts. Weight of dynamo is 187 pounds, height 13 inches, width same, length 22 inches. We use a small, home-made rheostat reducing pressure by five or six volts, which gives a little better results than working without resistance. The generator is protected by 40-ampere fuses at the car and 30-ampere ones at the lamp. We run a line of incandescent globes (9 20-volt, 30-watt, wired three in series) from car to the hall and have 120 feet of No. 10 marine cable from generator to machine. We obtain best results with ⅝ cored carbons, Electra or Bio. When we shut off the arc the other lights brighten perceptibly, but there is not to exceed two or three volts difference as shown by the voltmeter. From time entertainment is started till its close the arc burns continuously. I run slides and lecture while rewinding. Expect to start return trip about the 27th inst., passing through Missouri, Kansas, Colorado, Idaho, Oregon and Washington."

We are indeed indebted to you for the excellent description of the outfit. It will doubtless be of much benefit to others who may contemplate emulating your example. I am obliged to accept it as a fact, though I would not understand how uniform voltage can be maintained with an engine running without a governor. Well, I have learned that it can be and the knowledge is valuable. I am inclined to believe the secret lies in the fact that the engine power is so very greatly in excess of the load that it is not affected by slight variations in same. I wish you success on the return trip, but imagine you will strike tough sledding by the time you reach the mountains unless snow holds off late or you hustle through pretty fast. That auto certainly bears evidence of having been "through the war." If I wasn't already "taken," I'd be camping on the trail of that daughter myself.

Swelled Up.—Chicago, Ill., writes: "You claim that operators ought to study and learn all they can. You recommend your handbook and that your department be read. I have been operating fifteen years and don't think you or anybody else can teach me anything about it. Maybe the dope you hand out is all right for the yaps, but we operators don't need it—see? We are in the union here and get the money anyhow, so what's the use in spending money for books?"

If you could realize how unutterably silly your letter sounds, Chicago, I think you would not have written it. If their business because they "get the money anyhow" then it is indeed in a sad way. However, I by no means judge the whole by the drivel of one of its members. If you really have learned all there is to know, Chicago, I would suggest that you go on further use to yourself or anyone else in this world and find better employment in some other vocation where mental acumen will be found to your remarkable ability. Possibly, however, you are merely measuring others by yourself, in which case I would publish your literary efforts to show that the chumps are not all dead yet.

Motors.—Winfield, Kas., writes: "I note in The World of Sept. 16th that Pennsylvania writes and wants to know what kind of a motor he should use. I would say for his and anyone else's benefit that I have a motor attached to an Edison machine, and it works to perfection; that is, it does for me. My motor is only one-thirtieth of a horsepower. Would have put in a larger one, one about one-eighth of a horse, but was unable to get one here, so have been running with this one the past six months. I have it attached to the take-up shaft. Of course, I had to have a new shaft made, and made longer, so as to attach a belt wheel. Have a 1½ inch grooved pulley on the motor and a 7-inch pulley (grooved) on the machine, on the opposite side from the crank, which gives the proper speed, by means of the crank to the motor. I must first tell you that a one-thirtieth horsepower motor will not pull the machine from that point after the lower reel is about half full; it will however, as it is a hard pull from that side and that particular place, but, however, I have another motor on the floor with a three-quarter inch pulley and round belt running to the take-up attachment which takes up just right and does not pull too hard either. Of course, the motor runs the regular 1600 revolutions per minute, but the belt slips on the small pulley. With a one-eighth horsepower motor you would also need the extra motor, as it would have the power to pull the whole thing. I hope this will be of some benefit to any who happen to see it."

Many thanks for information conveyed by your letter, Winfield, though I think you have missed the main point. Pennsylvania wanted also to know what kind (make) of motor is best adapted for driving a machine. You say you have the machine motor attached to the "take-up" shaft. Presume by you mean the sprocket feed-sprocket shaft. You failed to mention kind of machine. Many operators who do not wish to, or are not allowed to run their machine with a motor, run it by hand, but pull the take-up by motor, thus reducing the labor of cranking the machine to almost nothing. Detailed information from users of motors, as to kind, power, speed regulation, arrangements, etc., will be welcome. Don't forget to mention kind of current used.

English Salaries.—Ogden, Utah, asks what salaries operators are paid in England.

Operators receive as low as 25 shillings, while in extreme cases they rise to the dizzy height of four pounds per week. The ordinary pay, however, is about 40 to 50 shillings for first-class men. A shilling is equal to about 24 cents and a pound to a little less than $5.00. It will therefore be seen that our English cousins who grind out the pictures do not dine on lobster and wash it down with champagne every night after the show, nor are they able to substitute their diamonds for the arc in projection. Ten to twelve dollars is their average. Taken as a whole a given standard of living is not so very much cheaper there than here.

Leadville.—Leadville, Col., writes: "I will gladly give you all particulars possible regarding my plant and to that end am sending blue prints furnished by Western Electric Company until in writing these shall be ready to supply you with such information as they can. (Blue prints not arrived.—Ed.) Will also give you as far as possible complete setting of my outfit and answer any other questions you may wish to ask. As I said, I am not an E. E., but I do claim to be out at the game, as I worked for Walter, Turner, Dawson and Howard (now the Walterdaw Company), in the old country when our film cement was a needle and silk, our films about one inch wide and a picture seldom a wonder for length. Therefore, my letterhead and statement as to years' manufacturing experience is not 'hot air.' But, even so, it is surprising how much one can learn, and I want to say that you are not only teaching operators but, what to my mind is still more important, teaching us to teach ourselves. I believe the thanks of all good operators are yours for your invaluable assistance. Just put a Kimble, variable speed, ⅛-h.p., A. C. motor on my machine and it is fine. I have rigged up a graduated dial, with a pointer, on the brush holder so that I can tell exactly what speed my machine is running and I find it helps my pictures wonderfully. I have been promoted to the position of General Manager of the Princess Theater Company, but my favorite spot is still the operating room—projection room, I call it. I have an operator doing the actual running, but make all adjustments and repairs myself. But returning to the motor-generator proposition: I believe it would do a lot of good to treat this matter exhaustively since so many operators and managers don't know the advantage of D. C. over A. C., and others, who do, think it is too expensive to install a rotary converter, or motor-generator set. Ours was laid down here for $230. It would have cost much less back East on account of excessive freight rates up here so near the clouds. (Leadville is nearly 10,000 feet higher than New York City.—Ed.)"

Like yourself, Leadville, I regard the motor-generator proposition as of importance and will welcome description of various plants, statements of their efficiency, cost, plan of installation and all matter pertaining to same. The matter is too little understood. I cannot quite agree with you on one point brought out in your letter. The speed indicator is all right in a way. I would be glad to have details of its construction and connection for publication. Still, I hold that the best speed regulation or, rather, the best way to judge proper speed, is by action on the screen. Exact judgment of speed by action on the screen is one of the finer points of operating. When a man is walking, make him walk naturally. When a couple are dancing a waltz, they should dance to waltz time and this is all in the hands of the operator. When an automobile race is on, its speed, within limits, is governed wholly by the operator. We are glad to hear of your promotion. The Western Electric people have written and it will be published next week.

Photographic Speed.—Detroit, Mich., writes: "Can you explain why it is that when an auto or wagon moves across the scene the wheels will sometimes appear to be sliding and sometimes apparently revolve backward. Both the department and handbook are simply great. Keep up the good work."

To understand the phenomenon referred to, one must remember that there is really no such thing as motion pictures. What we call moving pictures is nothing more or less than a series of snapshots taken at the rate of about sixteen per second. Now when a wheel is revolving and one picture is taken and during the 1/16 of a second (about) elapsing before the next exposure of the film the spokes have shifted just enough so that they have in effect exactly changed places with each other, we see no motion at all, the spokes being practically alike. If, on the other hand, the spokes have advanced not quite enough to change places we receive the impression that the wheel is revolving backward. You will notice that such impressions are usually jerky and of short duration. This is by reason that the camera or wheel, or both, vary slightly from uniform speed so that the synchronism of the exposures and spokes is not maintained for any length of time. This, Detroit, is about as clear as I can make the matter without going into a long-winded explanation occuping more space than I can spare.

Frisco on Parade.—San Francisco Motion Picture and Projection Operators' Union No. 162, I. A. T. S. E. (some name that), took part in the Labor Day parade and again carried off the honors for best appearance. Looking at the accompanying photograph one understands why. Surely a finer showing would be hard to make.

At the head of the operators' column was a float on which rested a "Powers Six," with flowers piled around. Each man carried a triangular streamer containing the legend, in large letters of white, "Operator." We are indebted to President-Business Agent Woods for the splendid photo, as well as for another which we shall have framed and hang in our sanctum sanctorum at home.

Condenser Trouble.—St. Catherines, Ontario, writes: "Am having serious trouble with condenser breakage. Use 210 volt A. C. Get splendid light through ordinary rheostats; Power's lamp and lamphouse. Have taken precaution by giving lamphouse more ventilation, also ground condensers till they were perfectly loose in holder. Also closed up all drafts and shut off fans in operating room. Still they crack in from one to two shows after being put in."

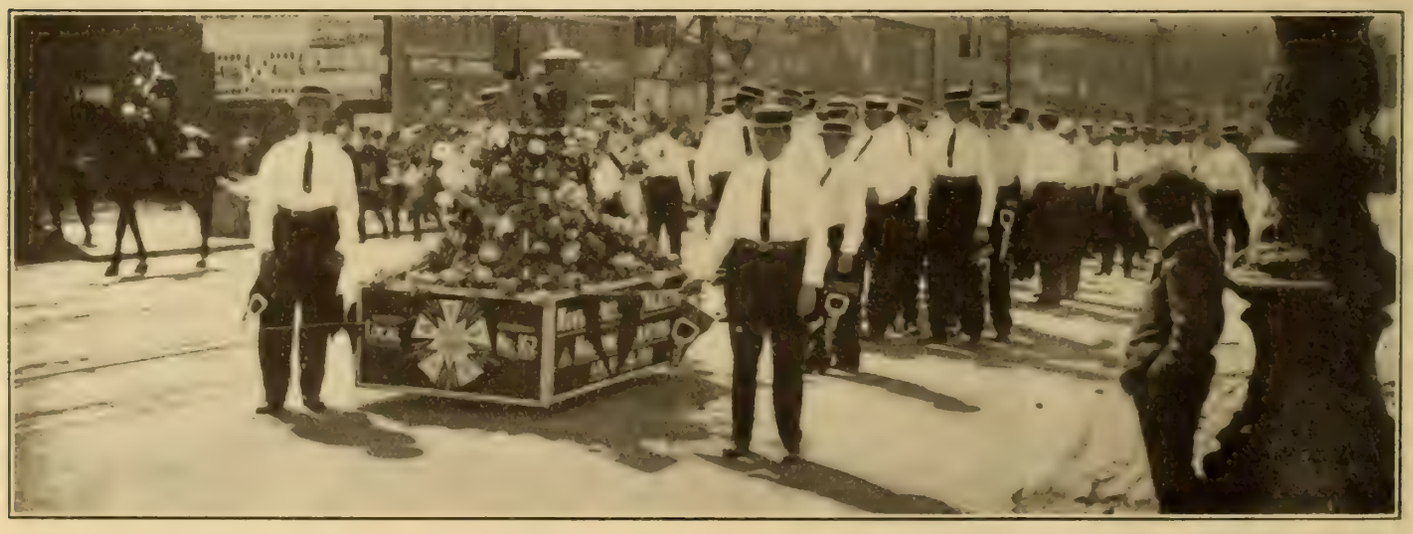
Condenser breakage is a tough proposition sometimes. I assume, as you ground the lenses, you have the Powers 5 lamphouse. Open the vents in condenser mount wide open. Before putting lens in put in a ring of asbestos, so that the lens won't rest directly on the metal. Don't open the lamphouse door directly after shutting off the arc. Possibly you are using very heavy amperage and short focal length condensers, which bring the arc close to the lens. Try two 7½ lenses, if you have shorter ones in. Try putting the lenses in cold water, bringing to a boil and then allowing the water to stand until cold. If local law does not forbid, try taking entire back of lamphouse out. As I said, condenser breakage is oftimes a baffling proposition.

Announcement Slides.—Washington, D. C., writes: "It might be of interest to you to know about our announcement slides. I conceived the idea of having slides made on a stencil cutting machine which is used for cutting stencils for addressing machines. One permanent slide is made, reading 'The next picture will be * * *,' or 'The next picture our feature film," and is fastened in between the two glasses, we then cut off the lower binding strip, insert the title slide. like one enclosed, and rebind at bottom. These stencil slides are cut at a cost of 1 cent each for three lines, or less, or 2 cents for four lines. We have all our advertising and special announcements made up in the same way and have received a great many compliments on the neatness and legibility of them."

The scheme submitted by Washington has the drawback that few have access to a letter perforator and they are too expensive to purchase for that use alone. Moreover one is not able to get very much on a slide. However, where one has use of a perforator the idea is valuable for short announcement. The letters are sharp and clean-cut. Their color may be varied by inserting, with the card, gelatine of various colors. I have used this scheme myself long ago.

Indianapolis, Ind., writes: "Operators of this city have been organized (L. U. 194, I. A. T. S. E., M. P. M. Operators) since October, 1910, having now approximately 90 per cent. of the craft in the union. We are getting along excellently for a young organization. Just at present movement is on foot to raise theater license from $25 to $200 per annum, but so far nothing definite has come of it. Indianapolis operators are licensed. They are required to pass examination and the annual fee is $5. We have about 65 licensed operators at this writing."

Glad to know things are in healthy shape in the City of the Circle. Trust they may continue so. Two hundred dollars is an outrage fee for a motion picture theater in a comparatively small city like Indianapolis.



Comments on the Films

"Two Men and a Girl" (Essanay), September 14.—The rural life picture impressed the reviewer as being in its early scenes slow. It pictures the jealousy of one of the men, but doesn't seem to get a strong grip on the situation or to be effective. There are two fistcuff fights, both of which plainly "played" that during the last one, the climax, the reviewer heard laughter behind him. The photography is excellent. The picture can hardly be very popular but is passable.

"The Squaw's Love" (Biograph) September 14.—Beautifully pictured forest scenes along a rapid river make an excellent background for this drama. Indian romance which, though probably impossible, is made most convincing. The Biograph players make acceptable braves and squaws. The story, a little slow in getting started, is skillfully planned and unusually exciting. It is largely poetry and has some humor. It is a good, desirable film and is likely to be very popular indeed.

"Wheels of Justice" (Selig), September 14.—A well-photographed and exciting melodrama in which Rex, the Selig dog, plays an important part. The story is made clear as to its main plot, but there is something left over in the picture that is not wholly clear. It is a picture made along the lines of such melodramas as were widely popular twenty years ago, with several novel incidents added. The climax is not skillfully handled; there is little suspense; mysteries are solved almost as soon as shown, and some confusion results. But it seems not an amateurish picture so much as a hurried one.

"A Cup of Cold Water" (Selig), September 21.—A dramatic picture of early times in Southern California. The story seems long in getting started, but the scenes are well designed and keep interest awake till the situation becomes clear. The child of aristocratic parents has been stolen by a bandit, the bandit captured and the child found by the padre who has educated her not knowing who she is. Just before her mother finds her and reveals her identity she is loved by an American and a Mexican. The Mexican has come to take her by force, but the priest saves her and then her mother enters with the American. The picture is interesting, but cannot be called thrilling.

"The Tired Absent-Minded Man" (Vitagraph), September 23.—Bunny is the tired and absent-minded man. He goes to sleep and leaves his bride-to-be waiting at the church. One of the funniest parts of the picture is when he suddenly realizes on the train that he has forgotten something. He can't remember what it is. It's the bride. He's taking a honeymoon alone. It's very amusing.

"Over the Chafing Dish" (Vitagraph), September 23.—This delightful little comedy merely reports the undramatic but human and interesting doings of a young and pleasing couple. It is piquant, and commendable as a slight but very pretty picture.

"The Culture of Bulbous Flowers" (Gaumont), September 23.—An instructive picture that shows how to care for bulbs. It begins with the potting and goes with them to blooming time. It shows some pictures of flowers and greenhouses.

"A Heart-Breaker by Trade" (Gaumont), September 23.—Four girls in this sentimental comedy want to marry an "ideal"; they want an aviator, so the artist, soldier, lawyer and merchant introduce a famous one to them. Each becomes desperately in love with him. From a distance they see his wife beating him, for he was married. Some of the scenes are pretty, but the picture is very slow.

"Starlight's Necklace" (Pathe), September 21.—An Indian story of love and jealousy with Starlight, a pretty squaw as interloper in a tepee village love match. The other squaw attempts to kill Starlight, but is badly wounded herself. This brings the brave back to her feet. The illusion of Indian life and character is not badly done; there seems to be some real Indians in the cast, though a stranger behind the reviewer likened the hero to a longshoreman. The setting of "Everybody's Troubles" (Essanay), September 21.—The apartment house farce after the Essanay pattern with the whole population coming from floor to floor looking for trouble. Very light, but there's a good comedy in the same reel.

"All on Account of the Porter" (Essanay), September 21.—The make-up negro porter got the wrong coat of an ice cream waiter. It is an arranged marriage comedy and the wrong man had the right coat to put the letter that is at. A little later the right man was put off at the wrong place. When he managed to get to the girl's house he found that the wrong man was the better man in the situation. Finally the right man was changed in the wrong coat and the two met at the ceremony. It's a funny comedy.

"The Human Torpedo" (Lubin), September 21.—How would you like to have swallowed a pellet of nitroglycerine and become a human torpedo whose constitution was afraid to jar and he in a beer saloon? The cops followed the man and, no matter what he did, protected him from getting out. Eventually he kept them all through the factory. It's novel and very amusing.

"When Wifey Holds the Purse-strings" (Biograph), September 21.—There are two elements, somewhat in the same reel. Like opposite sides of the same coin, they go very well together. The subtitle-lined milk bottle. The one is mirth, is the jumper; its true comedy made the audience howl and roar. Wifey isn't kind. Hubby and have up all his salary and she gave him fifty cents for spending money. He tried to treat the boys and with some difficulty got off by leaving the half dollar and an I. O. U. How he schemed to pay this off and failed to get the money out of wifey is the funny part. It is original and very enjoyable. The picture would have been better if it had ended more good naturedly.

"A Convenient Burglar" (Biograph)—On the same reel with the above, tells the other side of the story. Mrs. Gay was on her way to see her mother, but was stopped at the station by a telegram. Two of the boys have come in. They hear her coming and only one escapes. Mr. Gay takes the other to the station house." Hours pass and then Mrs. Gay goes out to find Mr. Gay. She finds both him and the "burglar" at a pretty roof garden in New York City. It's thoroughly good.

"Electric Boots" (Pathe), September 21.—A shoe store supplies boots which are electrically charged and the result while it makes the wearers do their work at fast time affords much amusement for the audience. The house-building operations are carried on with incredible speed. Some of the situations are funny.

"Old Delhi and Its Ruins" (Pathe), September 21.—A travel picture of the old city of Delhi in India. The first scene is of a caravan moving out of the city, which is followed by a view of the long bridge with characteristic towers and the latter portion of the film is devoted to showing some of the ruins just outside the city. It is a pleasing, instructive and interesting information at moderate rates.

"Surfing, the National Sport of the Hawaiian Islands" (Pathe), September 21.—Anything which entertains or regales our bathing in those islands brings to mind Mark Twain's inimitable description of a which was published many years ago. After seeing this series of views one is inclined to the conclusion that he did not overdraw his story. The various methods of riding the surf upon a board are clearly shown and the accurate pictures of the skill required to keep upon some particularly fine picturesque spots.

"Forgotten" (Vitagraph), September 23.—[illegible] the story of the neglect of a child by everyone and her passionate pining for her father, whom in a daydream of childhood which reaches every heart. Neglected and forgotten by her aunt with whom she lives, pining for her absent parents and her father's return, the little one merely exists. But her father does come at last and a better day dawns for her. The film does not teach that there is any intention of neglecting. It is merely that the busy aunt has other interests which obtrude themselves and cause her to unwittingly neglect this motherless child who longed for parental love. And when it comes the audience rejoices with her in her new found and evidently permanent happiness.

"Live, Love and Believe" (Essanay), September 22.—A love story which tells how a Mission worker rouses the latent manhood of a young man and starts him upon the right path. He falls in love with her, but realizes that he is not her equal socially, goes away and leaves her. They meet some years afterward and when he has been promoted to be a lieutenant and he is enabled to protect her from the insistent attentions of an ardent wooer. Shortly he is accepted as her lover and her father, the colonel, speedily congratulates them.

"The Cowboy's Bride" (Kalem), September 22.—A Western story, with an elopement as the principal feature. The life of the picture is the numerous difficulties which beset the girl's father when he attempts to overtake them before they are married. He fails, of course, and they succeed in having the ceremony performed.

"Shipwrecked" (Selig), September 22.—It is probable that the principal feature in this film with most audiences will be the half drowned man clinging to a spar and his rescue by the girl. That they were lovers was made plain before, but her father objected and undertook to compel her marriage with another man. The wreck upon the shores of the island where she lived and the casting up by the sea of her lover renewed the attachment and naturally it wasn't long before they went to the mainland where the ceremony was performed. The picture will be popular because it shows the triumph of the two lovers over the objections and adverse circumstances.

"The Battle of Trafalgar" (Edison), September 22.—Whoso has read of the Battle of Trafalgar and Lord Nelson's victory will find in this picture a reproduction of his impressions of that great historic event. If by chance any have not read of it they will see here a vivid illustration of what occurred on that great day. All the ceremonies and operations which have to do with preparing for a battle at sea, clearing for action, hoisting the colors and the other preparations are portrayed. There are little touches which will increase the interest, for example, Lord Nelson calling the mail ship back so that one letter could be sent. The action itself is realistic. Nelson's death is pictured with a solemnity which causes the audience to sit with bated breath as the commander passes away. It is a historic picture of unusual educational value and would be useful anywhere in teaching history. The mechanical work has been performed with skill and intelligence, while the settings are as accurate as it is possible to make them. The firm and its players deserve commendation for the production of so excellent a picture.

"The Life Saver" (Lubin), September 21.—A very pretty love story of the seaside dealing with people belonging to a life saving station and visitors, with much of value in the scenic line. It is a well knit, dramatic story and very well acted. Miss Lawrence and Mr. Johnson were never happier in portraying romantic parts. Two of the visitors, the inspector's son and a young woman who was in his automobile party make both the seaside lovers jealous. The inspector's son falls into great danger and is rescued by the life-saver. The acting is so delightful and the picture in every way so perfect that it will be remembered as a dandy picture.

"The Big Dam" (Edison), September 23.—The accepted suitor and the rejected suitor compete for the contract to make the dam and the happy suitor wins again. The time limit for its construction is a year with a $25,000 forfeit. The other man disguised gets a job as foreman and delays the work in many villainous ways. It looks badly for the contractor, for at a critical moment a false telegram has got him out of the way. His wife, however, takes a hand and the dam is finished on time. It is a well constructed and well acted melodrama, but it seems a little thin; the situation is not drawn sharp enough to be poignant.

"City of Bordeaux" (Gaumont), September 26.—A very interesting view of one of the most important cities of France. It begins with a general birdseye view and follows with details, many of which are highly instructive. It is short.

"A Friend of the Family" (Gaumont), September 26.—Age and a simple nature may be a bore to youth in careless happiness, but in a time of stress it often proves to younger folk a very welcome refuge. The situation in this pretty picture seems very slight, but it has a good deal of significance. The young man and his wife had an old friend. He seemed a good deal of a bore, but the time came when they disagreed. Each went to the old friend for advice and help and found a valuable ally. The scenes are very well posed and some are beautiful. The Riviera seems to be the place where the picture was taken. It is a picture that will please.

"Lost Years" (Essanay), September 26.—Through an accident, good and valuable years were lost to two men. One, the foreman of a working gang, was supposed to have been murdered. He fell into the river, was carried by the current under the docks and shanghaied. The other, a workman, was accused of murdering him and sentenced to life imprisonment, which was plainly unconstitutional since the murdered body wasn't found. The foreman, cast away in a strange land, gets work, marries and forgets his old associations. Thirty years later, the convicted man applies for a pardon, but is refused. An account of this is printed in a newspaper where it is read by the one-time foreman, who at once comes forward and the man is released. There are too many impossibilities in the picture for it to be a great picture, but it gives a chance for some remarkably human acting that is surely well worth seeing.

"Mary's Masquerade" (Edison), September 26.—Mary, as it chanced, came on a vacation visit to her aunt's the very evening she was giving a dinner to fourteen persons. One disappointed her. Mary was only a girl in short frocks, but her aunt let her dress up as a grown lady and come in in order to keep the unlucky thirteen at a table far away. Mary (Miss Fuller fills the part delightfully) has many amusing difficulties, especially with her long silk train. It makes a very pleasing picture. The scenes are well conducted and pretty. There is true, human experience under the comedy and the picture plainly pleased the audience.

"Pathe's Weekly," September 26.—The topical film by Pathe Freres this week has an astonishing breadth and interest. It contains, among many notable pictures, one of the Sultan of Turkey, the Chinese dreadnought that was recently on a visit to New York and of the Chinese rear admiral. An adequate description of the reel would be a newspaper. The weekly topical is in the running to become an international institution.

"The Match Maker" (Lubin), September 25.—The match maker in this picture is a young English aristocrat with a sense of humor. Mr. Johnson fills the part with a good deal of distinction, but Miss Lawrence, in a new and very charming role as a governess of a little boy, is the picture's center of interest. The mother who employs the governess is a widow with a grown-up daughter and an older son at college. Sir Henry calls and by chance meets the governess who enters with the youngster. He seems quite taken with her charms. The mother is ambitious of having him marry her daughter. While Sir Henry is being received, the older son returns from college and meets the governess with his little brother out on the lawn. He is badly smitten (this scene is charmingly conducted). It is now shown that the daughter is in love with the head gardener (Mr. McGovern takes the part). Sir Henry discovers them with their heads together. He is not very dignified as an eavesdropper, but he listens to them planning an elopement. Later, the elopement with the gardener being arranged for, the daughter discovers her big brother making love to the governess and she runs and tells, gets the governess discharged (this scene is very well done by both mother and governess). Sir Henry helps in the elopement and then shows the older son where the governess lives and we have another pretty love scene (freshly conducted) at her house. The scenario is fresh and amusing. It was perfectly produced and makes a delightful human picture full of humor and one that kept the audience breaking forth into ripples of pleased laughter. The acting is all excellent. The comedy ought to have a star pasted after it, to mark it out.

"Disappointed Old Maids" (Pathe), September 25.—A comedy presenting the adventures of a brace of old maids who become enamored of a young stranger with Chesterfieldian manners. All goes well until at their request he meets them, but quite thoughtlessly takes his fiance along, too. The addition of another woman sort of breaks up the dream of the old ladies and they are clearly much disappointed.

"Whiffles Hard Luck Stories" (Pathe), September 25.—A comedy telling how Whiffles, being in need of money, succeeded in raising the wind. The risibles of everybody in a New York audience were excited by this picture.

"By the Camp Fire's Flicker" (Vitagraph), September 25.—A love story with soldier life in the Philippines during the insurrection as its background. The American heroine is an army nurse and is separated from her lover, an American officer, who is wounded and out of his head, by the crafty work of a senorita, a Philippine girl, who, when her trick is discovered by the hero, attempts to betray the United States troops to her countrymen. The picture is very interesting. The scene showing the attack is, however, not convincing. Tropical scenes are very suggestively produced. On the whole, it is a commendable picture; it is very interesting.

"Arizona Bill" (Kalem), September 25.—Arizona Bill was discharged. An Indian stole a horse and at Arizona Bill's house quietly changed horses. Bill is falsely accused of horse theft. He knocks his accuser down and makes his escape on the stolen horse left by the Indian. One of the boys follows him (both on foot) out over the desert and captures him. Bill's wife sees the Indian and recognizes the horse and in the nick of time arrives to save her husband. It seems a little thin because it has been done very much better. But it is an interesting picture.

"The Two Orphans" (Selig), September 25.—This big production was reviewed at length in our issue of September 23, under notable films. It needs no special notice here. But it seems a pity to divide a gripping story like this into three parts and to show only one part a day. Even a hardened reviewer feels unsatisfied at being left in suspense and at having to wait till tomorrow to see the rest. How much more dissatisfied must the numerous transient visitors to the photoplay feel. They probably are not going to be able to see the other parts.

"The Revenue Man and the Girl" (Biograph), September 25.—A very tense and dramatic story of the Kentucky mountains which gives some of the Biograph players a chance to do some remarkably human and poignant acting. The story is like a mountain torrent, now lashed into white foam, now deeply emotional like a pine-shadowed pool. It is produced and acted to give a deep and lasting impression. The scenario is strong. The producer deserves much credit for his scenes and his types. The heroine and the little girl especially deserve praise. The heroine pictures her love for the revenue man and her sense that her father's death in a fight with his posse should be revenged. Love wins.

"Her Inspiration" (Lubin), September 23.—The farmer's daughter is a painter, rather sentimental in her attachment to her art. There's a country lover and a sportsman from the city who is stopping with her father. She runs away with the latter to study art in New York. Later we see her in a beautiful apartment and the man comes in drunk. He leaves her; she is cast on her own resources. Her inspiration is the bright memories of her youth cast upon the dark present. The picture is not great, but while as to its superficial things it is not true, there is a root of truth in it; but its significance is true only of genius. The picture is well photographed and designed. One could hardly call the ending a sincere scene.

"Gypsy Maids" (Pathe), September 23.—A love story, supplemented by an angry father who hurls his daughter over the bridge into the water. The lover plunges in and saves her, notifying the police of the action and papa shortly gets in bad. When papa is angry and is making unkind remarks to the young people, and later when he throws the girl over the bridge, there is considerable interest in the film. Otherwise its interest is not exciting.

"The Trials of a Tall Traveler" (Eclipse), Sept. 27.—A good comedy illustrating the troubles of a traveler who appeared to be too long for all the rooms, in which he was placed. He poked his head through the ceiling of one, his feet through the partition of another, and came to the conclusion that the jail was most satisfactory.

"Manufacturing Fireworks" (Eclipse), September 27.—An interesting industrial film illustrating a dangerous but fascinating business. The details of the manufacture of fireworks are here given, and the reproductions of displays afford opportunity to see some of the manufactures demonstrated. The audience watched with rapt attention while the film was running.

"Hal Chase's Home Run" (Kalem), September 27.—Every baseball fan in the country will want to see this film and then he will want to see it again. The feature of the game is when Hal Chase goes to bat in the last inning with the score 2 to 2 against his team. He has a home run which makes the score 3 to 2 and gets a little when the [illegible] What better could a baseball-loving public want or [illegible]

"A Cure for Crime" [illegible] interesting illustration in mental suggestion. Under the impression that he has been operated on and can no longer have evil desires, a thief goes forth to fight out the battle with temptation and wins. At the end of a month the bandages are removed. A good position is found for him and the cure is pronounced complete.

"His Sister's Children" (Vitagraph). [illegible] child's story which tells how some little people managed to part of lovers and thus brought them together again. The sick little one insists that they [illegible] and finally [illegible] to do, and the picture closes with the two clasped in each other's arms after everyone has left the room excepting the sick child and he [illegible] It is a good story, well told.

Independent.

"The Altered Message" (Solax), [illegible] tells how a girl altered a telegram so that her lover wouldn't have to take the field with his regiment, but could remain at the post with her. Serious complications arise, and while the girl is trying to straighten them out [illegible] are captured by smugglers and the girl has to make a thrilling ride for aid. There is a wild scramble for the smugglers and their prey. Eventually everything is made straight again. A breezy story.

"The Claim Jumpers" (American), [illegible] speedy, exciting picture of a district where oil well claims are being discovered. It is a well-planned romance. The hero's father objects to the heroine. This man discovers an oil claim and comes very near losing it, it being saved only by the ready wit and horsewomanship of the pretty heroine. She has a very tense race with the greedy villain. The country is interesting and the excellent photography shows much of it. The acting is good, though there is some camera consciousness shown in posing the scenes, a tendency to make the players walk up to the camera. The players are pleasing and it will probably be a popular picture

"Lost in a Hotel" (Powers), September 19.—This is a speedy comedy. One could easily get lost for a few minutes in a big hotel. If one were dressed in a kimono, it wouldn't be wholly pleasant to be opening the wrong doors by mistake. There are several laughs in the picture. It is commendable.

"An Old Time Nightmare" (Powers), Sept[illegible]—This does indeed picture an old time nightmare. The boy dreams that the lords have captured him, given him a trial by jury for bird nesting, and are going to cut off his head. Then he awakes. The bird policeman and the [illegible] jury are fine. It will please. These two or a split reel may be counted worth while.

"When the Leaves Fall" (Eclair), September 18.—A very pathetic picture. The doctor said the little boy's mother would die when the leaves fall. The child tried to tie the leaves on the trees and had a tumble. The mother and child were taken to the South, where the leaves never fall and all are happy. It is fairly well acted by the Eclair company, but [illegible]

"The Robber-Catching Machine" (Eclair), September 18.—Two [illegible] were expected at the park. Two hungry tramps [illegible] When the two [illegible] arrive the tramps have gone with much jewelry. The thief-catching magnet [illegible] and they have to run [illegible] and are caught. It is amusing, a trick film, and commendable.

By Registered Mail (Imp), September 21.—It pictures the strong attachment felt by a poor workingman and his wife for their bright little girl, an only child, whom an aunt adopted. The child gets homesick at the aunt's rich house and [illegible] by registered mail home. The [illegible] officials, entering into the situation, help her along and see that she gets home. The picture is affecting. There is some freshness in it and most of its scenes are well acted. The backgrounds are good. It doesn't convince one as having taken place, but is a commendable story fairly well pictured.

"A Just General" (Eclair), September 25.—A French lieutenant insults a private soldier's wife. The soldier is imprisoned for striking him and is about to be condemned to death. The soldier's father, one of Napoleon's soldiers, perhaps, puts on his medals, including one of the Legion of Honor, and begs the general to save his son. At first he is not successful, but later prevails. The acting in the picture is good. It is the film's best quality. The story is pleasant, but not important. It is, however, strongly anti-militarist. Its injustice is likely to stir the indignation of fairplay-loving, democratic American audiences.

"The Honeymooners" (Thanhouser), September 22.—The bride and groom were able to fool the wedding party. They were not bothered by showers of rice nor old shoes, but they managed to get into much perplexity of another kind. It is a picture that is sure to please. It is well arranged, delightfully acted and is photograhed in pretty scenes. It is not absolutely perfect, but it is a good, desirable film. It will surely be very popular.

"The Lie" (Thanhouser), September 19.—A pretty melodrama, well planned, with clearly contrasted characters. The main plot (a story of interrupted love) is worked out to its happy ending. The counter plot is left at loose ends. In this, a pretty stenographer and her little sister are left perhaps still uncared for. It was the need of the money that her employer, a broker, offered that induced the elder of these sisters to play, without knowing its import, a part in the lie that divided the hero and his sweetheart. The hero later rescues the little sister from drowning and then the big sister confesses to the heroine. It is a pleasant picture and commendable. Its chief shortcoming is that the interest is divided between the orphan sisters and the love story.

"Shenandoah" (Champion), September 18.—There is no lack of excitement in this Champion war days picture. It is a bit more speedy than the usual war picture by this company; and in Champion pictures, where things happen they are apt to happen fast. The chief battle scene of the picture (there are three or four) is unusually effective. The battle takes place just beyond the brow of a grassy hill. There is plenty of smoke and some running about. It is a very commendable scene. Champion war pictures are apt to have some foolish incidents. The Southern captains ordering a dummy shot and what led up to it is the most unconvincing part of this picture. As a whole, it is not unlikely to please the small boys and the gallery.

"The Stolen Horse" (Champion), September 20.—There is a freshness in this story of a Western town and its pretty school teacher, but its convincing power suffers at times for the sake of originality. It isn't a dull film; quite the reverse, there being some thrilling scenes.

"The Great Charleston Hurricane and Flood" (Imp), September 18.—The damage done to the smaller buildings in exposed places of the city by the recent storm was great. Pictures of littered streets, railroad yards and flooded streets are shown. It's an interesting film.

"The Bicycle Bug's Dream (Imp), September 18.—A trick film, cleverly made and more or less thrilling. It certainly will keep spectators who are not used to this kind of picture awake. It is not important, neither is it slow, but will serve excellently as light entertainment.

"The Girl and the Chauffeur" (Yankee), September 22.—Built on the lines of a recent romance in high social circles. A very effectively pictured elopement begins this film. The father of the girl gives chase in an automobile; it is very speedy, but the young people are married. She is warmly welcomed by her husband's people, including his father, who is dressed like a livery man. The young chauffeur becomes a rich garage man and, in time of a Wall Street panic, saves the father-in-law, who has the French name of Cordier, from financial ruin. It is a picture that will amuse. In some places it might serve as a feature—Newport, for instance. It is well acted and photographed.

"Oh, You Stenographer" (Solax), September 20.—It is not, strictly speaking, a story of business; very little of that was done in this office. Dad and the two boys fall in love with the new stenographer, who is a daisy. They scheme to get ahead of each other. In the end the girl's husband comes. There is no dragging in the picture. Most of it is amusing, for there is enough human truth in it to keep it going. It is a fair light comedy.

"The Rose and the Dagger" (Rex), September 21.—Three of the Rex players have produced in this film a drama which will be differently viewed by different audiences. In the larger towns and cities nothing out of the way will be seen. In the most conservative portions of the country fault will be found with certain attitudes assumed by the woman in her diverting dance and in the freedom which the bandit takes with her at different times. The substance of the story is that the woman is left by her lover in the shelter of an old castle during a storm while he goes on for means to bring her safely home. The castle is the abode of a bandit who returns before the lover. He discovers the woman's rich jewels and demands them, and she, to save her jewels, dances and flirts with him, seeking to distract his mind until her lover arrives, and works him up to a frenzy of passion. Her principal aim was to secure the dagger which he carries in his belt. After allowing him to make love to her and after a very suggestive dance with him she succeeds in securing the dagger and strikes at him, but misses, only cutting his arm. Infuriated, he attempts to rush upon her and seize her, but at this juncture a stroke of lightning kills him and the lover appears. Complaint will be made that some of the poses of the woman are almost indecent. For example, where she allows him to take off her shoe, holding her foot almost as high as his head when he is doing it. Again, the same criticism will apply when she insists upon his putting it on.

"How Hopkins Raised the Rent" (Solax), September 27.—A fresh and amusing character comedy. Hopkins is a man capable of living by his wits and his landlady and her help are characters worth seeing. It is a good entertainer. By the way, Hopkins raised two rents.

"An Italian's Gratitude" (Solax), September 29.—This picture is filled with the truest heart interest and, with the exception of the doctor, is also very well acted. The doctor's camera consciousness seemed to leave him only in scenes where he carried a lesser part. An Italian family are treated kindly at the doctor's door and receive small coins for music and dancing. The Italian's little boy falls in climbing up a rose trellis and is hurt. The doctor attends him and saves his life. The doctor's little girl dies. The Italians give up one of their two children. The girl doesn't want to go to the doctor's home; the boy loved the little girl who died and it is he who goes. It is a commendable picture.

"The Law of Retaliation" (Ambrosio), September 30.—A tale of the siege of Pisa. The pictures are interesting and well photographed, but the acting doesn't seem to be quite up to Ambrosio's standard. The players are conscious of the camera.

"A Strange Invitation to Dinner" (Ambrosio), September 30.—An amusing farce. A man picks up a girl on the street and he buys the dinner, a big one, all he is able to carry. He lugs it home with the girl and is introduced to her husband.

"Lucky Bob" (Bison). September 26.—The construction of the great dam in Bear Valley makes an exceedingly interesting background for this romance. The story is a well-made melodrama. Bob, a hoist man, and another character, one of the young civil engineers employed in making the great dam, love Nell, the pretty daughter of the contractor. Nell overhears the jealous civil engineer planning to injure the hoist man by tampering with his hoist. An accident (effectively suggested it is) follows and at first it looks dark for Bob. Nell accuses the engineer. There's a speedy chase by the sheriff on horseback and the fleeing engineer is captured by a lariat. Then Bob is vindicated. The unusually interesting background and skillful conduct of the picture make it one very well worth while. It can hardly fail to win favor with all classes of audiences, for it is among the most interesting pictures of the week.

"White Fawn's Peril" (Bison), September 29.—There is likely to be art in Bison pictures. There is much natural beauty in these scenes. White Fawn's capture wasn't convincing, but after that the picture is stronger. White Fawn was indeed in peril and her rescuer showed much courage. It's a good, artistic picture, wholly Indian.

"Bill and His Friend" (Lux), September 30.—This picture features a big black bear who's fully taken to a masquerade ball. It is very light entertainment, in fact one of the slowest of the "Bill" pictures in some time.

"The Little Goatherd" (Lux), September 23.—A slight but poetic picture of village life in France. A little girl was sent out with the family nanny goat and two kids, but an artist got her to sit for his portrait and she let the goat stray. The artist paid for the damage. It is commendable.

"The Circular Fence" (American), September 25.—Fresh scenarios and good acting are usually found in American pictures. Artistic scene making also is common; but the photographs in this picture, though good, are not quite so good as usual. The story of the circular fence and its confusing effect on Rattle Snake Ike and the hero is amusing. The hero came out best and got the big reward for bringing Ike in. It was a hard part for the actor to deserve credit. There is a romance also. It is a worthy and amusing picture.

"The Rustler Sheriff" (American), September 28.—An unusually speedy, interesting picture with a sharp fight, a hard chase partly in horse and rocky ground and partly on foot. The sheriff, also the rustler, led the posse along the wrong trail. The hero discovers the place where the sheriff changes his "make-up" and learns the plans of the outlaws. He collects the boys and they surprise the gang. Then comes the fight and the chase. The end is called the "Wrath of God." It is astonishing. A picture likely to excite enthusiasm.

"For His Sake" (Reliance), September 27.—It is a hard story, but it is well designed and better acted. William Walthall plays the part of the struggling artist, for whose sake the girl, whom he loves, who loves him, marries a rich art collector. The girl's part is very well taken by Miss Ruth Robinson. The old man dies and the two are re-united. The acting of the three leading players makes the film notable. It's a good picture.

"Weighed in the Scale" (Reliance), September 30.—Some very well photographed interiors distinguish this film. The camera man has not always been successful in his out-of-door pictures, though that last scene, with its attempt at pictorial effect through leaving sharp contrasts of highlight and shadow is very interesting and also has effectiveness. The picture is also notable for the amount that is told clearly in the space of one film and for the marked and natural contrasts in its characters, especially the lesser figures. It is acted only fairly. The story is a romance, like several others we have seen. The sheriff is not accepted by the girl who marries the other man, a drunkard and later a thief. He is a friend of both and after the husband dies in prison we are shown in the last scene, the sheriff and the girl a year later. It is a fairly commendable picture.

"The Half Breed's Atonement" (Powers), September 30.—The half-breed was an outlaw and the sheriff wanted him. The sheriff's little boy was hurt by the accidental discharge of a revolver. That was the way the half-breed's little son died and when the half-breed found that this boy needed a doctor, he went to the village to get one. The sheriff captured him. The sheriff's wife saved him from the rope. It's interesting.

"Imaginative Willie" (Powers), September 26.—This story of the Wild West as imaginative Willie told it to his young and receptive friends has a delightful quality. The thing has been done before, but not in this way. It is skillfully done and very likely to please.

"Waterfalls of Bohemia" (Powers), September 26.—On the same reel with "Imaginative Willie," this scenic which is very fair makes the release well worth while. The latter part of the scenic is very good, showing some of the most interesting scenes in Europe.

"Mutt and Jeff as Reporters" (Nestor), September 30.—This picture is interesting and very amusing. It stands up in accomplishing its purpose all the way through.

"Getting Even" (Nestor), September 30.—A speedy farce after the French model. It is amusing as such farces are. It is commendable as very light entertainment.

"The Young Doctor" (Nestor), September 27.—The old doctor was a medicine prescriber; the little table was covered with bottles. The cowboys tore up the last prescription and sent East for a young friend who had just graduated. The story deals with a struggle for adjustment between the old doctor and the young man. The old doctor's wife gets sick and the old man, at length being alarmed, brings himself to calling in the young man in consultation. The wife gets well. The old doctor's pretty daughter marries the young

"Lochinvar" (Champion), September 28.—The Champion Company has found a commendable subject, well-arranged, for this romantic story of the Scottish border lands. The old ballad is well known. The picture tells of this Scottish blade who "came out of the West" and rode off with the bride. It is a well acted, skillfully made picture and commendable.

"Through the Dells of Wisconsin in a Motor Boat" (Imp), September 27.—A trip very enjoyable through a great canon up a winding stream. Not all the photographs are good, but some are very interesting.

"The Co-Ed Professor" (Imp), September 28.—Some of the scenes look like undergraduates, but the situation is amusing. The picture will serve as very light entertainment.

"'Tween Two Loves" (Imp), September 28.—Love was stronger than the girl's affection for her father. Pride in the father was stronger than parental love. When the daughter's husband died, the young widow with her baby had a hard time. The father at length forgave her. It is a very well acted rural story. The little mother [illegible] from a burning house. A commendable film.

"Hearts and Eyes" (Eclair), October 2.—The poor young woman was blinded; she said her younger sister eloped on the street the doctor passed; he noticed her, invited her to his clinic and gave her back her sight. He fell in love with her and she married him. It is unintelligently acted and poorly cut and photographed. It has some fine backgrounds, but is very displeasing.

"For Your Hats, Ladies" (Eclair), October 2.—This is a very instructive picture showing how ostriches are plucked and how the feathers are sorted and dyed, made fuller and curled. It is on the same reel with the above and together they make a film quite worth while.

"Man" (Yankee), September 29.—An effective play partly. The "man" is built like a man to break a horse's neck. The picture opens with prehistoric scenes, very interesting, that show the elemental things on which, as a foundation, humanity has been built. After these scenes, we are given a melodrama with a steel plant for background. The strong, ambitious workman grabs the runaway horse in the nick and rescues the owner's daughter. A professor of spiritualism is introduced after the man has been promoted in order to bring out the situation. The climax is a not very convincing struggle between the weakling and the "man," who is prevented from throwing him into the furnace by a vision. This scene is not effective. It isn't a play to excite enthusiasm, but the picture has some very fine scenes and is excellently photographed.

"The Black Horse Troop of Culver" (Champion), September 25.—A scenic picture of cavalry drilling by the students of Culver School. A large percentage of those pictured were taken with horsemen passing at some speed near the camera, and what is going on is not always clear. The pictures of the fancy drilling seem good, and are interesting.

"The Cook of the Ranch" (Champion), September 27.—When you think you've told a story that merits its repetition to three people you are likely to find that 111 people know it. This film would have been better if the story that it represented had been more original and funnier. The characters furnish some amusement, but they're not very amusing; it's a bit slow. Some of the scenes were well designed and photographed.

"Obliging a Friend" (Nestor), September 30.—A rather interesting comedy in which a friend is induced to take the cook's place temporarily and thereby comes to grief. The last seen of him he is disappearing minus his skirt with the neighbor's dog and a motley array of cookery on his tail. He caused a lot of consternation in the household, including what had been begun on the cook and her cousin, ere he was giving her cooking lessons. It is all very funny and very boisterous, but none the less funny for that.

"Caught in His Own Net" (Great Northern), September 25.—A talented sister and her husband have apparently fasten suspicion upon the accepted lover. This is unfortunate, though the man the girl wanted was ready to take a large prize in a lottery and so able to help her father when he needs it. The story is simple, but is [illegible] and the mechanical work is satisfactory.

Manufacturers Advance Notes

"THE ARTIST'S SONS" (Selig).

The Selig Western Company, under the direction of Mr. Francis Boggs, have recently completed a picture entitled "The Artist's Sons," which will be released on October 6. It is, to say the least, a production unique to picturedom. It gives us an intimate, behind-the-scenes knowledge of a painter's life, and the method he follows in producing an expensive canvas.

Before the auditor's eyes a beautiful picture is developed from its inception, through the various stages of laying in the first sketch, the rough half-picture, etc., to its completion and hanging in the salon.

Rob Wagner, one of the foremost painters of this country and author of this scenario, personally supervised this production at the Selig Studios in Los Angeles. The producer's dominant idea in this picture, was to produce one artist's picture that would be correct in every detail. Mr. Wagner's own children played the sons. Every property and picture used in the enormous studio and gallery scenes were brought direct from Mr. Wagner's studio. The portrait canvases alone are valued at $10,000. The story is sweet and lovable and is imbued throughout with a wonderful realism and picturesque atmosphere. The story takes us in rapid succession through scenes in the artist's home, studio, gallery, etc., and gives us an intimate view of that land of enchantment—the artist's Bohemia

"THE STAGE DRIVER'S DAUGHTER" (Essanay).

There appears to be an unusual demand nowadays, both in America and in Europe, for film stories of Western life in the United States and Canada. The conditions remind one of the great hold that melodrama had on the minds of theater goers in this country fifteen and twenty years ago. Now the craze is only a memory and melodrama is strictly tabooed. One feels pretty safe in predicting a similar fate for the present-day type of Western film subjects.

These Western pictured stories are nearly all of the elemental type. There is no plot to speak of, and the outcome is clearly apparent from the start. One never quite loses the mind of a child and that, perhaps, is the reason that so many of us, whose hair has been tinged with silver, gaze on these pictures, with such thrills and wrapt attention. And, perhaps, that is also why the display of firearms and the shooting of bad men is viewed by us with complacency, if not with inward gratification.

A breezy Western film, "The Stage Driver's Daughter," by Essanay, was viewed by me the other day and I must confess that I was interested throughout and subjected to some of the thrills previously referred to. There is no shooting in this film, although there is the display of a "shooting iron," and the mere display keeps four claim-jumping rascals at bay, until the rightful owner of the new-found mine has filed his claim.

Scene from "The Artist's Sons" (Selig).

I would be lacking in appreciation of feminine charms and of the clever impersonation of an irresistible Western girl were I to omit making particular mention of Miss Valaya Field in the title role. This young lady has the gift of signalling her emotions and thoughts clearly by means of a pretty and expressive face, and she does it quite naturally, with never a hint of acting. I can promise everyone that views this film one of the finest exhibitions of rough country driving seen in a lifetime. During the wild race Miss Field holds the lines, and the six horses fairly eat the miles. Just watch her flick the fly off the ear of the off leader with that streamer-like whip. And she can ride as well as she drives, a something that Western girls take pride in doing.

It is only natural to suppose that some of the scenes in this film will rock like the sea, and one must remember that the camera man is getting shocks from the rough places on the road, just the same as would you, were you a passenger in the stage coach. The photography, however, as a rule, is clear.

The story is a simple one. Rose Lacey is the darling and only child of old Pete Lacey, the stage driver. She holds him by the heart strings in firmer grip than he holds the old roadsters that have learned to know the meaning of the slightest sound made by him.

Rose finds it lonely in the little mountain home which, with mother dead and "dad" on the road, throws dark shadows on her young life. She dispels the shadows by coaxing her father to permit her to accompany him on his trips.

On one of these trips a good-looking young tenderfoot from the East is a passenger. Rose and he get acquainted. Mutual admiration begets love. He bids her good-bye and goes off on a prospecting tour. Rose mopes over his absence, but is cheered by a letter advising her that he has struck it rich. He requests her to accompany her father on the trip the day following, as he will join them at a certain point, on the way to file his claim.

A band of reckless men learn of the tenderfoot's strike and decide to jump his claim. They notify the owner of the saloon at Half-Way House, where Lacey regularly takes a dram of whiskey on his daily trip, to "dope" the old man's liquor. A share of the spoils is promised in return, the object being to prevent the tenderfoot from reaching the land office and filing his claim before the "jumpers" can arrive.

Rose and her lover remain in the stage while Lacey goes into the saloon. Alarmed at his long stay there, Rose goes in and finds him unconscious. After vainly trying to arouse him, she is about to leave the room when she spies a letter dropped by the saloon keeper, which explains the plot against the young prospector. She pins the notice on and tells her companion

"THE MOVING PICTURE MAN."

This is the title appropriated by Charles Farrell, promoter of motion picture theaters whose headquarters is at 548 Broadway, Buffalo, N. Y. Mr. Farrell has a long list of houses to his credit and is gradually extending his field of usefulness. He carries a complete line of the latest of everything in theater equipment. Mr. Farrell's latest contract covers the equipment for the new Oakdale Theater, corner of Seneca and Babcock streets, Buffalo, N. Y. His specialty is the promotion of new theaters complete with which goes a course of personal supervision and instruction on the operation of picture theaters.

"TREMENDOUS DRAWING POWER OF THE 'WORLD.'"

In a letter from the Exhibitors Poster Service, of Chicago, Ill., the following testimony to the value of the Moving Picture World as an advertising medium is generously given:

"We began to receive replies from our first ad. in your paper from Eastern exhibitors before the Moving Picture World reached us. This surprised our situation, but we believe it speaks very highly for the tremendous drawing power of The World from an advertising standpoint. Our plan of distributing posters met with an instantaneous success and we feel sure these results were in a large measure gained through the Moving Picture World, which we believe has no equal today as a medium of advertising for motion picture exhibitors and manufacturers."

WATCHING FOR THE COMET.

A new comet has been discovered by certain well-known astrologers or prognosticators. Professional star-gazers announce that it will be visible to the naked eye on Monday, October 23rd, precisely. It is further predicted that the new orb will have a tremendous and direct influence upon the moving picture industry. Its effect will parallel that of the Eastern Star, marking the dawn of a new era in the film business similar to the era that came after the star that was followed by the Wise Men of the East. When this new astral body is seen there will be certain wise men (exhibitors) who will rise and follow the comet out of the land of punk and piffle into the higher realms of art. There may be some who remain behind and doubt, but such will be lost beyond redemption.

The astronomical rubbernecks, by means of aeroplanes and one-eyed opera glasses, have been enabled to discern the new comet, and have sent down the information that this strange planet possesses a powerful interest for film exhibitors who have had trouble in magnetizing very much of the coin of the realm. These occult squinters declare that the new comet is surrounded with unlimited bales of the long green. They say that the leaves on the trees are $100 bills; that the swollen streams are choked with filthy lucre, and on each side the banks are pebbled with golden ducats. At the steering wheel of the new planet the wiseacres have recognized a well-known film maker, but his visage is obscured for the present by clouds of Standard Oil stock. They foretell that the comet will appear on October 23rd with a blinding flash that will make the world gasp with astonishment. There will be a fearful collision between an irresistible body and an immovable body. The result will be a blizzard of coin all over the earth, but the strange part of it is that nobody but an exhibitor will be able to make any of it stick to his fingers. To him it will be tangible, but to all others as quicksilver.

After the crash the Comet will again soar upward and remain directly over 344 E. 32nd St., N. Y., and begin doing business as the Comet Film Co. And then, every Monday and Friday thereafter, for many years, there will be a shower of reels of exquisite moving pictures, the equal of which has never been seen before. Mammoth productions with large ensembles numbering into the hundreds will come with much needed regularity. These will be varied with high-class dramas, occasional classics, and large military spectacles. Negotiations have been already made by wireless with a well-known Broadway comedian to work in split reels, and several well-known dramatic writers have been secured to write scenarios. The Comet Films will be marketed through the Sales Co.

Scene from "Tommy's Rocking Horse" (Melies).

TOMMY'S ROCKING HORSE.

The scene herewith is taken from a charming little comedy by the Melies Co., with a child as the leading actor. It is a story about a little Western boy whose love for horses developed at a very early age, and we see in it his passage through the "wooden age" of equine history. Realizing that the public always welcomes an appealing child story, the Melies Co. have done their best to make this film a standard of its kind, and it is to be hoped that many more such commendable efforts as "Tommy's Rocking Horse" will soon be forthcoming from this enterprising studio.

"A HOT TIME IN ATLANTIC CITY" (Lubin).

When a comedy is so good that it has an enormous run and sticks in the minds of the people so thoroughly that hundreds of requests are received to produce it again, it is "some comedy." This is exactly the case with "A Hot Time in Atlantic City" by the Lubin Company. It was released a few years ago and became wonderfully popular. In response to this flood of requests, the Lubin Company have reproduced the plot with new actors, new scenes, and it is even better than its first version. It is scheduled to be released on Saturday, October 14th.

The plot has to do with Count Carisford, who lives in a handsome cottage in Atlantic City. He and his wife go out for a stroll on the beach one morning. Two tramps see them leave the cottage and are struck with the pleasures and delights which accrue to people of wealth and position. They reconnoitre the house and discover an open window through which they enter. They find a goodly supply of the Count's clothes and promptly exchange their own rags for these. They also secure some of his cards. Then, arrayed in all this panoply, including high hats, spats, canes and decorative ribbons of honor, the hobos sally forth upon the boardwalk. Wherever they go they are received with the greatest obsequiousness. The Count's card is everywhere as good as money.

They loll at ease in the roller chairs; they saunter with debonair dignity. Everywhere they are the observed of all observers. Ah! it is sweet to be a count. Finally they discover two most charming young ladies on the beach. The weakness of American girls for titled noblemen is well known and our two hobos are soon basking in the smiles of beauty. Oh! how sweet it is to live. But by the time they had been well warmed in the smiles and admiration of the ladies, Dame Fortune seemed to become jealous. The Count and his wife happened to see them and the Count recognized his clothes, his hats; Mon Dieu! his ribbons of honor. Wildly he waved his arms. He called for a gendarme. The cops came and after an exciting chase captured the bogus counts. They are finally seen behind the bars. It is simply great.

IMPORTANCE OF SOUND EFFECTS.

The recent controversy regarding sound effects has caused moving picture theater managers throughout the country to sit up and take notice. The fact that such companies as the Kinemacolor and Monopol Film have realized the importance of sound effects and used them to great advantage in conjunction with their "Coronation" and "Dante's Inferno" pictures is proof positive that they have realized their importance.

Leading managers have long admitted the fact that Lyman Howe could tour the country and turn them away right under the noses of the biggest men in the business, but they never stopped to consider that the realism of the sound effects he used with the pictures drew the audiences, and insured large crowds on return engagements, while the managers of the grand marble picture palaces with the noiseless pictures slept silently on.

As an example, the Philharmonic Society, of New York City, under the leadership of the great Gustav Mahler, played Springfield, Mass., last winter to a particularly empty house. The following night Lyman Howe played the same house with his army of ease-makers and packed 'em in to the doors. The Philharmonic Orchestra was probably the most expensive organization that had ever played Springfield, but the crowds preferred Howe's pictures, which only went to show the financial possibilities of motion pictures when accompanied by the proper effects.

With the introduction of sunbeats in the [illegible] and [illegible] theaters the trap drummer has been considered a necessary addition. The average drummer in these houses does not realize the importance of bringing out the effects with the pictures and it is up to the managers to see that the pictures are given the attention they deserve.

It is only within the last few years that it has been possible to secure an outfit of sound effects that were made specially for moving pictures, but there is no longer the necessity for managers to be without them, as there is a factory in New York City devoted exclusively to the manufacture of realistic sound imitations. The Yerkes' products are now used by many of the best houses throughout the country.

The progressive managers have taken advantage of the opportunity to improve their performances and impart all the realism possible to the pictures. Sound effects have come to stay and the wise guys are putting one over on their sleepy competitors.

ANOTHER THANHOUSER FEATURE FILM—"HER MASTER."

There will be shortly issued by the Thanhouser Company a remarkable film which has for its theme the illustration of the controlling power of a master mind. It opens with a ballroom scene in which a coquette is shown trifling with men's affections. They flutter around her like moths around a flame, seeking for a smile or some favor. She is evidently proud of her irresistible power. Finally one gentleman approaches and is introduced, but he is not smitten with her charms and turns away haughtily without a second glance. She is so upset by this unusual experience that she dreams of it at night and her dreams carry her back to the Stone Age when we see her as a haughty queen dethroned and shorn of her influence by the savage progenitor of the man who was destined to be her lord and master. The scenes depicting this part of the story are remarkably realistic, well acted, and of faultless photography. Altogether it is a very pretty conception, a bold and successful departure from the usual thing—the kind of picture that your audience will talk about afterwards.

"A CONSPIRACY AGAINST THE KING" (Edison).

A chapter from "The Cockerel," showing a page from the history of a gallant knight of the road, during a period when English life was as romantic and stirring as the wildest dreams of our wildest West. Galloping Dick, the hero, was a freebooter and his name was the terror of the countryside, but the incident of the story shows a gallant and kindly side to his rough character. The impersonation, the costuming and the realism of the scenes reflect the highest credit upon the Edison Company for their painstaking attention to details.

VITAGRAPH DOINGS.

Some idle gossipers made the remark when the Vitagraph Company began to issue five reels a week that we would see a falling off in quality. The absurdity of this remark is apparent when it is known that before they issued the additional reel their program was laid out for four months ahead. Among the important three-reel subjects that are now engaging the attention of the company, special mention must be given to "Vanity Fair," which is almost completed; "David Copperfield," and a magnificent presentation of Milton's "Paradise Lost" in three reels. This last stupendous undertaking will not only eclipse all their previous efforts but it is their intention to make it a world leader.

MR. A. M. KENNEDY IN NEW VENTURE

Mr. A. M. WE CONTINUE TO OFFER EACH WEEK MR. G. M. ANDERSON, (POPULARLY KNOWN AS "BRONCHO BILLY") IN THRILLING STORIES
OF EARLY DAYS IN WESTERN AMERICA. STAGED UNDER THE PERSONAL SUPERVISION OF MR. ANDERSON, ASSISTED BY A CAREFULLY TRAINED COMPANY

VISIT OF A ROYAL FILM MAKER.

Sir Count Pier Gaetano Venno, President of the Milano Films Company, of Milan, Italy, paid a flying visit to America, arriving Saturday, Sept. 23, and departing Tuesday, Sept. 26. His only visit was at the offices of the Monopol Film Company, 145 West 45th Street, New York, which firm has been exploiting in America "Dante's Inferno," the well known Milano masterpiece. The Count's visit was made for the purpose of closing a contract whereby the Monopol Film Company will obtain the exclusive rights for the Western Hemisphere of all the large productions of the Milano studios.

The Count is a very wealthy man, but is nevertheless alert and active in business matters. He is on very friendly terms with King Victor Emanuel, of Italy, and enjoys the privilege of taking photographs at his pleasure in any part of the King's private domains. Count Venno during his short stay was deeply impressed with the enterprise of America. His secondary object was to observe the reception of his "Dante" by Americans and he was overjoyed to see the evidences of its wonderful popularity and success, and went back home with redoubled enthusiasm and encouragement.

The New York Hippodrome made a profound impression upon the royal visitor and he pronounced it the greatest thing of its kind he had ever seen, stating also that Europe had nothing to compare with it. On Sunday he was escorted to Coney Island, where his eyes were opened very wide.

It was the Count's intention to remain longer in America, but fresh news of the impending war in Morocco caused him to send a cable back to Italy that he would return on the first boat and be ready for duty at his country's call. He is very patriotic and declared that in case of actual hostilities he will be found where the bullets are flying thickest, adding also that wherever he went he would have his loyal camera man at his side, and that nothing would be neglected to make the first genuine war picture a valuable record. Count Venno departed with the assurance that if he is not punctured by a bullet he will come back to America for a longer stay. He is first cousin to the present Italian Ambassador to the United States.

SALES CO. EMPLOYEES' BALL NOT FAR OFF.

The Sales Co. employees are now putting the finishing touches to the arrangements for their coming reception to the trade, and report that they expect to run off the most successful affair of its kind in the annals of the film trade.

The ball, as stated in a recent issue, will be held at Alhambra Hall, 126th St. and Lenox Ave., New York, Saturday night, October 14. That isn't very far away, as a glance at a calendar will tell you —only two weeks. The last one was a very pleasant and successful affair, but this one coming will make the other one seem like a funeral by comparison. Those who were at the last ball will appreciate the full meaning of the foregoing statement.

This will be the only opportunity this year of meeting the cream of the film business on a social basis, and they certainly know how to have a good time when they get together. Don't forget, Stauch's Military Band from Stauch's Pavilion, Coney Island, will furnish the music. The tickets will cost $1, but will include a handsome souvenir pillow with the Sales Co.'s emblem worked on it in colored silk thread. The hall is rented until noon of the day following. Forty-five dances are on the program, with 75 extras and encores. Moving picture surprises will be sprung, quite different from the usual thing. The entire list of Independent film manufacturers will be present, and all film actors for miles around have been subpoenaed and are delighted to think their presence is compulsory. There is to be a large, handsome souvenir program, embossed and in several colors, which will also be gotten up as a souvenir, and an advertisement in it by anyone in the trade will certainly be a paying investment. Write to H. A. Spanuth, care of the Sales Co., 111 E. 14th St., New York, for tickets and ad. rates. Tickets also for sale at the office of the Moving Picture World.

RORY O'MORE GIVING BIG SATISFACTION.

The Kalem Company has been receiving many flattering testimonials from exhibitors and others in regard to the product of their stock company in Ireland. Their first Irish release was "Rory O'More," adapted from the well-known story and play by Samuel Lover. Having made such a success of the first one, it is but reasonable to suppose that the forthcoming releases of Irish subjects will show an improvement as the O'Kalems settle into their regular stride. As an evidence of the popularity of their work, the following letter is submitted:

"Kalem Company, New York,

"Dear Sirs: Again we congratulate you on 'Rory O'More.' It has drawn the best business of months to our theater, notwithstanding the fact that B. F. Keith opened an 1800-seat, $200,000 house in town. Of course, you might say $2,000 a week vaudeville is not in the same class as a three-day straight picture house, but we get the best people in town and to take away 3600 per day from the possible amusement seekers and still show an increase in business means nothing less than a strong puller on the bill.

"We are so confident as to the pulling power of 'Rory' that we extended our booking and will show it a full week instead of three days. This has happened but twice before in the history of our house, which is four years old.

"In regard to the 'Colleen Bawn,' we have already booked it.

"We are going into this thing as big as we can and you must realize that it is a problem to handle a three-reel picture in a house where three reels and two songs have been the bill for four years.

"Let us know just what you can do in helping us in advertising this picture and those to follow.

"Yours truly,

"BOWLAWAY AMUSEMENT CO.

POWERS STUDIO NOTES.

Daniel McCarthy, of Yonkers, N. Y., was recently held for the Grand Jury for stealing several films from the Powers Moving Picture Company. Thomas Evans, manager of the company, had given the man a chance for the sake of his wife and children, knowing that the man had a bad reputation, and gave him employment. Mr. Evans was inclined to drop the charge on account of the man's family, but was informed that McCarthy would have to stand trial regardless of sentiment.

Miss Mina Burns has been added to the producing staff of the Powers Western stock company.

The Powers Company have been quietly at work equipping a complete and modern factory which is nearing completion. The new plant is located at 216th Street and Broadway, New York. Active productive work will begin in about six weeks. It is a new building of brick and concrete and will be perfect in every detail, equipped with the latest pattern of Bell & Howe perforators, Aristo lights, Corcoran tanks, and other up-to-date devices.

The utilization of moving pictures, as an educational factor for fighting saloons and vices of Chicago, is the latest sensation brought about by the Young People's Civic League.

Our Berlin contemporary relates a somewhat amusing episode which happened recently in an outlying district. A van belonging to a brewery in the neighborhood was passing slowly along the street, when it was suddenly pounced upon by some men, and many of the bottles with which it was laden were emptied of their contents, and either drank by the thirsty culprits or turned wantonly into the gutters. Following these came some women and children, who, nothing loath, assisted in the general devastation, for the weather was hot and the roads dusty. But on the roof of a house close at hand was observed a film operator busy at work taking in the whole scene to form part of the evening kinematograph performance.

With a bill of fare like this placed in front of your theatre, people are bound to go in and spend their money, even though they have just had a turkey dinner elsewhere. As one of our customers wrote us,

"It Increased My Business Ten Per Cent"

And it will increase yours, Mr. Exhibitor, if you will give it a trial. What it has done for others it will certainly do for you, and you should not allow some old fogy notion to stand between you and possibly your future success, at least a great increase in business. You certainly will find, as hundreds of others have found, that this is the proper system, and that it solves the poster question for some time to come.

LAEMMLE FILM SERVICE ALLIANCE.

One of the heaviest buyers of Independent pictures is the Laemmle Film Service Alliance of Portland, Ore. This exchange is run on proper lines and has secured a number of the leading houses in Portland and, from all accounts, is giving very satisfactory service.

Colorado Springs, Col., is to have a new $20,000 moving picture theater. The International Realty Company, an interest of the Stratton estate, is making the arrangements for the Colorado Amusement Company. A ten-year lease has been taken on the building, which has already been started. The new theater will be located on South Nevada Avenue, adjoining the postoffice, and upon Stratton property. Seating capacity will be 1,000.

Small Chimes

Although these Chimes are light enough to be used on transient work, they are not toys by any means, but a complete set of 18 tones, one and a half octaves chromatic (C to F), with sufficient volume and power to fill any size auditorium.

LEEDY MFG. CO., Indianapolis, Ind.
Gentlemen: I received the Small Chimes O. K., and must say that they are the finest addition I have ever made to my line of traps.

I used them the same week I received them and made a big hit with the audience. No drummer in a Picture House can afford to be without them; they really are a valuable instrument.
Yours truly,
O. J. POWELL,
Theatorium, Mt. Carmel, Pa.

Chimes are not a fad—they have come to stay, and any drummer who intends to keep up with the procession will find our Small Chimes a valuable addition to his equipment.

INQUIRIES

Correspondents are advised that no attention will be paid inquiries which do not give the name and address of the writers. For the purpose of reply, initials or noms de plume may be used.

Inquiry as to the private affairs of photoplayers will not be answered. This includes the question as to whether or not they are married.

No inquiries of a general nature will hereafter be answered by mail and only in special cases when a stamped self-addressed envelope is enclosed. Many correspondents ask the same question and we have initiated this department to save our own time and yet help out our readers when we can.

O. L. G.—Your question will be answered as soon as the answer can be obtained, probably next week.

R. L. B.—We can give no information respecting the identity of those who question this column, but we do not mind telling you that the inquiry did not come from your section of the country, if that bears on the reason for your unusual request.

G. C.—Leo Delaney is and has been busy with the Vitagraph, though he has not been featured in many of the recent films. This is merely a matter of chance, however, for he has posed for the usual number of pictures and they are liable to come with a rush. Remember that the Vitagraph turns out five reels a week now.

C. L. B. asks how to obtain the return of a scenario held since the first of August by an unnamed company. He is advised to send a formal demand for the script, registering the letter and enclosing a return cover for a reply. If this does not bring a reply, the best plan is to make another copy of the story and send it elsewhere, notifying the first company that he has done so, and that they must not use the story. If they do, he has redress at common law, but the probabilities are that the story is lost, which accounts for the silence of the editor. The incident is unusual, since the film companies are generally reasonably prompt and courteous.

A. L. H. wants to know if it would help him to get an engagement as a photoplayer if he told that he was a scenario writer. It most assuredly would not. The scenario writing photoplayer is the last thing a director should want in the studio. If A. L. H. has the small pox or the yellow fever or some simple thing like that, added to dramatic experience, he might stand a chance, but experience is now a requisite and no one wants a chap around who is more busy with scenarios than his job.

"The Bunch."—There is no place in town where all the first runs may be seen. Try the Fourteenth Street Theater for the Independent product, and the Keith & Proctor houses for the Licensed reels. Since the dissolution of partnership between the latter, the six daily releases are divided between the two managements. There is no house in New York or vicinity where three or more first runs are to be seen without vaudeville. We share your sorrow over the fact, but can only suggest that you go early in the morning, when the vaudeville players are all asleep. There are some houses where they have dated runs and not even illustrated songs, but you'll have to hunt these up in your vicinity.

L. V.—Again! No. Maurice Costello is not dead yet, nor is it Arthur Johnson your informer might have meant. This goes for the rest of the bunch who are slaughtered weekly in the photoplay gossip.

P. G.—Nat Wills played a very limited engagement with the Powers Co. this summer and then went back to vaudeville.

L. E. S.—We do not know whether or not Miss Turner's mother also plays with the Vitagraph, but we believe not.

Elsie.—Are you trying to "kid" us? There was no trouble with the censors over the Edison company's The Big Dam. Sydney Booth was the Lord Nelson in the same company's "The Battle Trafalgar." Address the company relative to the photograph you ask about.

G. K.—It will not pay you to send your manuscripts abroad unless you cannot find a market here, and are willing to take the $5 or $10 paid in England.

D. H.—Miss Laura Sawyer is an Edison player. She has not appeared with the other companies you mention, but came from the stage to the Edison studio. Marc McDermott is "as tall as he looks," to borrow your expression. We do not know his exact inches, but he is a six footer.

B. F. C.—Miss Lillian Walker was the Gladys in "The Second Honeymoon." She is a regular Vitagraph player. Maurice Costello was her opposite. We like to be obliging, but we pass up the question as to whether "Jean" has any puppies for sale.

Constant Reader.—We do not advise making application to the film companies for employment since experience is demanded of the successful applicant. Even the trained actor has trouble before the camera at first, the stage being so small in comparison with the larger settings of the dramatic stage.

P. I. N.—The telegraph sounder in Kalem's "The Express Envelope" was in the box on the desk; a touch of realism that appears to have gotten past you. The idea of the box is to amplify the click and at the same time cut off the sound save in the direction of the operator. That scene was remarkably well set and the girl operator used the proper procedure. Your objections are based on your own errors; not on any made by the company.

T. M. N.—Possibly the Sales Company, 111 East 14th Street, New York City, can aid you in locating the desired film on some particular date by directing you to the nearest exchange in your territory. Why not ask the manager of the house you patronize to get it for you?

J. B. C.—We do not know where the Imp players will spend the winter. Due notice will be given in our columns when a decision is arrived at.

G. H.—Edward Phillips played the sailor in "The Latent Spark." The Chinese scenes were not made in China, though they are very convincing.

Arthur H.—Your question is obscurely worded, but if by smallest you mean the size of the picture on the film the new Edison home projector uses a regulation film, but the pictures are each ½ by ¼ inch. If you refer to the number of persons employed, there have been several done with a single character.

G. W. E.—Complains that of late the Independent releases he sees at his regular photoplay theater show a low standard of acting in that the players rush through their scenes while the players in the Licensed product at a nearby house are "dignified and clever." There are clever players in most all companies, but this is not a matter of acting but of operating. The film is passed through the machine too rapidly, causing the players to seem to rush through their parts. The reverse of this condition may be true elsewhere and the house showing Licensed films be possessed of the speed maniac for an operator.

O. T.—The Pathe company has a number of real Indians at the Jersey City studio who play in the Western dramas and make the wardrobe for the Western pictures, but they are not given important acting parts.

Vic.—Miriam Nesbitt was the wife in Edison's "The New Church Carpet" and Robert Brower her husband.

E. D. M.—J. P. McGowan and Miss Gene Gauntier had the leading parts in Kalem's "The Special Messenger." Spottiswood Aitken and Ethel Elder were the parents of Flo in Lubin's "Her Humble Ministry." Miss Lawrence is still with Lubin.

Bruce.—William Dincan, of the Selig company, is the former stock favorite.

E. M. W.—Miss Todd and Miss Fields were the two women in "Spike Shannon's Last Fight." Miss Fields generally plays the leads in the Western Essanay pictures. Gilbert M. Anderson was Spike.

C. L. S.—Mrs. Mary Maurice played Mrs. Hawkins in "My Old Dutch." She has played several important parts very successfully with the Vitagraph. Charles Sutton was the Priest in "The Venom of the Poppy" (Edison).

J. G. T.—Photoplayers furnish their own wardrobe for modern plays or are supplied from the wardrobe room if the costume is unusual. The fact that you have an extensive wardrobe will not help you much in getting a chance with a company unless the wardrobe was acquired through stage work. It is cheaper to buy a few dresses than it would be to teach you to act.

W. H. E.—The Pathe "Faust" reels were not made in Paris, but by the section of the company located in Nice. The red rooster is pretty widely spread through Europe.

T. R. M.—You are confounding Sydney Drew, who played a special engagement with the Kalem company and made a production for the Champion company, with Sydney Booth, who is a regular member of the Edison company. This seems to account for your error. Mr. Drew has not played with the Edison stock company.

E. McL.—Sidney Olcott is the Kalem director who had charge of the Irish party.

H. E. S.—Miss Pates has the lead in Pathe's "A Close Call." Miss Mary Fuller is still with the Edison company. Miss Lawrence appears to have no intention of leaving the Lubin forces.

F. H. E.—William Shea is the Vitagraph's "Davy Jones," playing all the roles so named.

V. M. B.—Queenie Mack is not now with the Essanay company.

T. H. P.—Jack J. Clarke was the Lieutenant in Kalem's "Jack's Reformation."

L. L. O.—No photoplay has yet been released showing Nat Goodwin in films of his own making.

W. W. R.—We do not believe that it would pay you to try and sell your scenarios in Europe. The pay is small in England ,and you would have to have translations made for the French and Italian markets. If you cannot sell your stories here, is it not probable that you would meet with no better success abroad, where you would suffer the handicap of not having your material in accordance with local customs and modes of thought?

Allan.—We cannot inform you as to the arrangements made with Bud Fisher for the use of the Mutt and Jeff idea.

A. G. D.—There is nothing to prevent an American production of the Inferno, save professional courtesy, and the knowledge that it would be hard to beat the Italian production. The pictures are copyrighted as a production; not as a story.

G. M. K.—Miss Betty Harte is now with the Selig company. Are you getting her mixed up with Mabel Normand, who is the Vitagraph "Betty"?

Albert.—Your inquiry has been referred to the maker, but we do not believe that the latter will be willing to disclose a trade secret.

MAKE 'EM YOURSELF SLIDES

Make them yourself. Written with pen and ink or typewriter. Three minutes to make a slide. Used for advertising slides, to announce future or feature programmes, for chorus slides when chorus slide is missing. We send four colors of gelatin. The slides look well and any one can make them. They are handy also for announcing vaudeville acts. In fact they may be readily used for anything you may wish to say to your audience.

For the sum of three dollars ($3) cash with order, we will send by express, charges not prepaid, the following:

24 cover glass, 1 package binder strips, 1 dozen mats, 1 instruction sheet, 1 form sheet and 50 strips assorted colors gelatin—enough for from 300 to 400 slides. Order now. Address

SCENARIO WRITERS!

If your scenarios do not sell find out why. Perhaps your manuscript can be rewritten and made saleable, and your mistakes may be corrected in future manuscripts. The author of "Technique of the Photoplay," etc., will give your manuscript personal criticism and revision for a fee of only $2.

The work of experienced writers, that conforms to standards for theme and treatment, will be marketed for a commission of 10%. A reading fee of 50c must accompany each script, to cover cost of reading. Please take note that this fee does not cover any criticism in the event that the manuscript is not found available for marketing.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

MUSIC AND SPECIALS.

Monroe, La., Aug. 25, 1911.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—I devote considerable attention to The World every week, and keep them on file for future reference, thereby always having a source of valuable information at hand for almost any emergency.

The Projection Department keeps me out of trouble by making corrections before the breakdown occurs, and when something out of the ordinary happens, we generally find the remedy in that department. I have an A No.1 operator, and one who knows his Edison Exhibition A as well as the telegrapher knows his keys, and his trained ear can detect the slightest fault in his machines while in operation.

However, it wasn't my intention to discuss projection in this, but rather to state my experience with the musical end of the picture game. We are running four licensed reels, with a complete change daily, and have a three piece orchestra, headed by Mr. Fred Christen, well known throughout Louisiana as a violinist of exceptional merit; the balance of the orchestra consists of piano and drums.

Prior to commencing our shows, matinee or evening, the orchestra renders an overture from some of the popular operas, which is followed with appropriate music for the pictures. We do not play the pictures, in the true sense of the word, nor do we overdo the sound effects, and freak noises are strictly forbidden.

Through the medium of slides I made an appeal to my patrons to inform me the class of music they preferred, and the response was beyond my expectations. In nine cases out of ten, the preference was for classical music, and the request that we discontinue "playing the pictures," but rather finish the selection being played from the start. I submitted this proposition to Mr. Christea, and he adopted it. As we have a shipment of film on hand for the next day, he is enabled to select his program accordingly. I have also run slides, asking my patrons to kindly send in the name of their favorite piece of music, and from the responses received, the leader arranges his program, and that program is flashed on the screen the day previous. On Wednesday evenings, between the first and second shows, Mr. Christen renders a violin solo from one of the operas, which has become very popular; in fact, our music, and our method of arranging our programs for each day has increased our receipts fifty per cent. and it means as much to our performances as does the pictures.

We aim at all times to give the people of Monroe the best in our line, and they have shown their appreciation by their generous patronage. We have a standing order with the General Film Co. for all the specials, which I advertise in the newspapers, but not before I am assured that the film is what it is represented, as nothing hurts the game more than to "bunco," or "flim-flam" the lover of moving pictures. By adhering strictly to this method of advertising, my specials pack the house from 7 P. M. to 10:30 P. M., and the matinee usually plays to capacity as well.

Thanking you for your kind indulgence, I am, yours for success,

W. L. JENNINGS,
Manager.

HIS NAME IS MUDD, BUT HE LIKES THE WORLD.

Searcy, Ark., August 23, 1911.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir: I have been a reader of the World for the past three years and have never once written you how much it has benefited me. I think I can best express myself with the following:

Managers will have no other.
Operators' helper.
Vanquishes all cares.
Interests.
Nothing better.
Growing weekly.

Perfect in detail.
In every state.
Covers everything.
The organ of photoplay.
Unexcelled for advertising.
Read with interest.
Explicit.

Worthy the first place.
Once read, always read.
Releases worry.
Lessens trouble.
Don't fail to ge it weekly.

Very respectfully,

R. T. MUDD.

"SPITTING IN THE PICTURES."

St. Louis, Mo.

Editor The Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—In the name of decency, let us do away with spitting in the pictures. In two recent releases this revolting bit of realism turned my stomach and I doubt not the collective stomachs of the rest of the audience. In this day of hygienic uplift, it is a sad commentary on our photoplay world if we stand for such a practice that violates the canons of good taste and sanitation. If a character in a picture must "chaw" tobacco—well and good—but let him at least refrain from insulting our imagination—and our sense of decency—by demonstrating the inevitable result that accrues from such a practice. Before the advent of the moving picture, many, many, hayseeds "chawed" to their hearts' content on the stage, but the portrayal stopped at the "chawing."

Another point and I am done: In Indian pictures I have often heard the complaint made of the difficulty the audience experiences in distinguishing between the characters on account of the dark faces of the actors. It is the same in minstrel shows and in Chinese plays. The remedy I suggest would be that salient and strikingly different arrangements of headdress and costume of the "leads" be provided for so that when War Cloud, Rain-in-the-face and other aboriginal gentlemen make their bow on the screen the audience will be spared the fatigue of a guessing contest. Yours faithfully,

A Well-Wisher of the Photoplay.

A WORD ABOUT FEATURE PICTURES.

Montrose, Colo., Sept. 2, 1911.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir.—It has been some time since you have heard from this neck of woods, but I am still alive and doing business at the same old stand. I have had my trials with the ministers the same as some others I read about in your paper. The enclosed clipping will explain what I got up against, but now they are losing ground and I expect to open a Sunday show in a month or more.

Note the enclosed clipping about "Faust." Such pictures I get 20 cents for and pack my house. The only objections I have, are, I can not get these features often enough. For "Ten Nights in a Bar Room," I have 24-sheets, 8-sheets, 3-sheets and one-sheets, that I have had on hand for over one month, waiting to get that picture, and afraid they will not notify me ahead of time, so I can bill it at least a week in advance, although I have asked them to give me plenty of time. That is a big injustice to us exhibitors. We very seldom know when we get a feature until it arrives, then it is too late to advertise.

I showed "The Tale of Two Cities," to 180 people in two nights, and "His Trust" and "His Trust Fulfilled," to 130 in two nights. I should have, and would have had, over 1,000 if I could have advertised them.

If we could only pick our dates for such feature pictures, we would all make more money. My Opera House holds 1,000 people and when I put on an extra I pack it every night.

I was sorry to see the Film Index sell out, but now I think it was best, for The World gives us both sides of the business that we can rely on as the truth. It gives the devils their dues.

I wish your critics, on commenting on the pictures, would comment on them and cut out the story. I, for one, order all my pictures from the critics' report. Some of them have no report at all, only a part of the story.

For some time past the picture business in this part of the country has been having a hard time, but it will be great this fall, as we are having the biggest crops we ever had ,things will soon be booming here. Wishing you all kinds of success, I remain, yours very truly,

EDW. J. COOPER.

WANTS "MAKE COPY" EXPLAINED.

To the Man-About-Town, Care Moving Picture World.

Dear Sir:—It was with interest that I read your "observation" in the issue of September 23rd, regarding the "indictment" against the studio which returned my manuscript with writing on back. Said writing being, "Good story, etc. Make Copy."

The manager of the studio in question gave you a very lucid explanation of the matter. He says, "Perhaps the favorable note was made by mistake, on the wrong manuscript; and it is not unlikely that the manuscript was returned in mistake."

That so many mistakes should occur in a business place, and admitted as such by the manager, is to my mind, a little more than a "mild impeachment" against his office force. However, he is wrong in both instances, the manuscript was returned, accompanied by a letter, in which the title of the script was quoted, and further stated that the script was good.

The fact that some reader marked "good story, etc.," on the script, is in itself nothing. (I thank him for the good opinion.) But the last two words, "make copy," can not be so easily explained. The manager of the studio in question also states that, "the author should, in justice to himself, and studio, have inquired as to whether a copy of the story was withheld, or any part of it had been produced."

I did not know it was customary for a film company to make a copy of a rejected manuscript, it evidently is, judging from the words of the manager cited. If this be the case (and I am taking his words for it), of course, the notation on the back of my manuscript is accounted for. But the question is, "Why make a copy of an undesirable manuscript?" it only takes up room, and as it is of no use, it will eventually find its way to the waste basket.

To conclude this article, I will say, that the script in question is now in the hands of a film maker and, as I have had a good report on it, it will probably pass from my hands via the "We enclose herewith our check" route. I have, however, kept the page of manuscript with the notation on it, and will show it to the manager of the studio, through the "Man-about-Town," and the Moving Picture World, if he cares to look at it.

I want to thank The Moving Picture World for taking this matter up, without solicitation. It shows the spirit of "Square Deal" that hovers over every page in the journal.

With best wishes for your continued success, I am,

Yours very truly,

INTER-NOS.

"BLOOD AND THUNDER" POSTERS.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear sir:—"There is plenty of blood and thunder in that show, all right." Overhearing the foregoing remark by a lady who was looking at a poster in front of my theater, led me to investigate the cause of her uneasiness. I examined the poster and discovered that the artist had depicted a geyser of blood shooting up out of the breast of a man who was lying on his back, having fallen from a precipice above. A woman stood by wailing.

It happened that the picture on the poster was the same that the manufacturer had used in the bulletin of the film, and what the poster-maker had diverted into a geyser of blood, ascending skyward, and then spattering on the ground, was really, in the bulletin, nothing more than a handkerchief sticking out of the man's breast pocket.

Don't you think the makers of posters should be a little careful about emphasizing the grewsome and harrowing, since the manufacturers are trying to improve the pictures and make them more elevating? To change a pocket-handkerchief into a stream of blood, is going a long way toward misrepresentation in a rather unfortunate direction. Yours very truly,

Geo. H. Carley, The Star Theater, Cooperstown, N. Y.

CORRESPONDENCE

IN THE MISSISSIPPI VALLEY.

Stewart Reed has resumed his place as trap drummer at the Princess Theater, at Waterloo, Iowa, succeeding Forrest Anderson, who will go into vaudeville.

The Orpheum Theater, Watertown, Wis., is showing feature pictures each night. Monday night is American night, Tuesday is Irish night and Friday German night.

Harry E. Otey has purchased the Grand Opera House, Robinson, Ill., from the stockholders.

The two reels and slides on "The White Slave Trade" did not get by the censorship at Mattoon. The city officials and newspaper men believed that it was not a good exhibition for the general public.

Harold W. Moody was arrested at Ossawatomie, Kan., and taken to Oklahoma City, Okla., to answer to a charge of having forged the name of the United Moving Picture Company to checks, with a rubber stamp. Moody was a stenographer for the company.

Peter Boosalis has contracted with the R. J. Cheney Company to build a $9,000 moving picture theater at 808 East Lake Street, Minneapolis, Minn.

The Gateley Airdome, East Capitol Avenue, Springfield, Ill., was wrecked by the storm which struck that city September 13, and will not be reopened at least this season. The seats and undamaged property have been stored.

Chicago papers chronicle a case of retribution. Francis Myer's "turn" was so bad that an audience in a moving picture show hooted him. Francis was fined $5 and costs for creating a disturbance.

Four members of the Stadler family, who conduct the Princess moving picture theater, at Peru, Ill., were run into by an automobile recently and seriously injured. After the show had closed for the night the party started home in the rain. They took a dark green piano cloth, which they put over their heads to keep off the rain. This was so dark that the driver of the car did not see them and crashed into the party. Miss Kate Stadler suffered a fracture of the collar bone.

A jury of his peers has decided that a Macon, Mo., farmer who sold his land in a wealthy and prosperous community to buy a moving picture show in a large city and a motor car needs a conservator. We did not know there were twelve men outside the moving picture business who believed that anybody could not make a fortune managing a picture show.

Arch Roberts, who has been conducting a moving picture show in Savannah, Ga., has returned to his home in Litchfield, Ill.

George Fitch, of Peoria, does not believe that the Santa Fe Railroad can put on the luxurious tourist train it announces. It will not be complete, he says, until the coaches are equipped with moving picture machines, so that the passengers will be provided with plenty of scenery while the trains are standing on sidetracks.

A. Kleinbeck, of Chicago, has leased the Lyric Theater at Elkhart, Ind.

Harry Loper, of the Lyric, Springfield, Ill., has lost a good singer. Miss Mary Fielding, who has been popular with the Lyric patrons for over a year, and Walter O. Hettiger, of Springfield, were married September 12 in that city.

Joliet, Ill., Elks are planning to have the members of the local lodge take part in a film, which, it is said, will be made by Selig. The pictures will be exhibited to aid the fund for entertaining a State convention.

"Enoch Arden" was the feature film of an evening's entertainment recently given at Wildey's Theater, in Edwardsville, Ill., by the Woman's Club of that city.

Steve Bennis, manager of the Airdome, Lincoln, Ill., has said farewell to vaudeville and will rely upon pictures and illustrated songs.

C. H. Thayer has leased the Otloe Building, in Pana, Ill., and will move his picture show from its present location in the airdome. A thirty foot addition will be made to the new home.

Will Clarke has sold the Rockford Moving Picture Parlor, at 106 West State Street, Rockford, Ill., to Henry Nobin, of that city. Clarke had been four years at this location.

Phil Wade, of Fairbury, Ill., has leased the opera house, at Pontiac, Ill.

The opera house at Newman, Ill., has been leased by J. O. Crist.

The Odeon Building, in Olney, Ill., has been leased by the Woodlawn Amusement Company, of Springfield and Boston, and remodeled and redecorated. Announced plans call for vaudeville, roller skating and moving pictures.

Bentley & Atkinson have purchased the Theatorium, at Carbondale, Ill., from G. R. Huffman. Improvements have been made in the property.

There is a notable increase among the towns in Central Illinois that are using moving pictures as a free attraction upon fete days. Sparta merchants recently had a week of booster sales and visitors were given free tickets to a local show. Medora featured a night display of films at its Scholl Park picnic. A continuous show was given for visitors at Brighton, Betsey Ross day. These are but few of perhaps fifty that have been noticed this summer, but it indicates the drawing power moving pictures have for the rural residents and partially explains why the small town manager is able to get his price of ten cents.

Finley Hare and N. M. McGinnis have leased the Wright Opera House, at Denton, Tex.

The firm of Fields & Swan, which has been engaged in the moving picture show business at Pittsfield, Ill., has been dissolved, Mr. Fields remaining in charge.

The manager of the Tureman, Virginia, Ill., believes his show is worth a dime and is going to get it.

Edward Fellis, manager of the Hillsboro, Ill., Opera House picture show recently gave a benefit performance for the Old Settlers' Association.

Plans for one of the best moving picture theaters west of St. Louis have been drawn for B. H. Powell and Edward Croak, of Oklahoma City, Okla., to be erected at 111-113 West Main Street, in that city. The theater, which will cost between $50,000 and $60,000, will have a seating capacity of 1,000 and will be elaborately decorated. It is hoped to have it open before the holidays. Powell is owner of the Majestic Theater, Oklahoma City, and also has moving picture shows in Tulsa and Enid. He recently disposed of the Olympic and other Main Street picture shows.

"Dawn" was the name selected for the Charles Vance's new moving picture theater, at Streator, Ill., Miss Gertrude Polk winning the diamond ring out of 6,000 contestants. The name causes a Streator rhymester to break forth:

We waited the close of the contest,
With many a sigh long drawn,
We imagined a score of other names
But never the name of Dawn—
In the dawning of the morning
We have always been abed.
If the Dawn comes in the evening
We will surely lose our head.

And all the poor contestants
Studied hard, I know,
To find the name best suited
For Charlie's picture show.
The poor, poor "tired judges"
Must have worked hard and long
When out of over six thousand names
They finished up at Dawn.

Come all ye contestants
Who lost out on the name,
Do not be grieved or angry,
For you "was not in the game."
Soon we will get the habit
And get it good and strong,
Starting out at 8 p. m.
And finishing up at Dawn.

The Mabel Theater Company, of Chicago, has been incorporated with capital stock of $40,000 to do a general theatrical business. The incorporators are Louis Levy, Benjamin Stewart and Benjamin F. Shaffner.

John H. Ferris, who is said to have made a small fortune out of moving picture theaters in Chicago, has purchased a country home near Aurora, Ill. The place is now in the hands of carpenters and landscape gardeners and will be a beautiful home when finished.

The Jesse James' films as shown by a carnival company were barred at Waukegan, Ill.

The Princess, the new moving picture house, has been opened at Woodstock, Ill., by J. C. Miller. The place, which has a seating capacity of 270, is declared an attractive small city showhouse.

Edicts against films showing Beulah Binford have gone forth in Springfield, Peoria, Decatur, Danville and Joliet, Ill., Milwaukee, Wis., and in most of the leading cities in the Middle West.

The Illinois Theater, at Abingdon, Ill., has been leased to Johnson & Kadel, of Watertown, Ill.

J. E. Russel has let the contract for a new vaudeville theater, to be erected at a cost of $6,000, at Storm Lake, Iowa.

The Jesse James' films are not popular in Indiana, according to a special from Mt. Vernon, Ind., to the Grayville, Ill., Independent:

"One of the proprietors of the local theatoriums leased his house to a man who was running pictures of Jesse James and his famous raids. The house was packed and after the first show the manager demanded that the fellow close the show on the score that the pictures were rotten. The owner of the pictures refused to close and officer Schnack was called and not only shut the show up, but ran the owner of the pictures out of town."

Basil O. Argeropolis, of Kewanee, Ill., has leased the Princess Theater, Chestnut and Second Streets, in that city, and will conduct it after it has been remodeled.

O. W. Ulrich and J. F. Hoppe, of Alton, Ill., have opened the Crescent, a moving picture show, on Third Street in Alton.

The opera house at Eldorado, Ill., was destroyed by fire September 13, causing a loss of $8,000.

The Airdome, at Tenth and Vermont Streets, Quincy, Ill., has closed for the season.

The governor of Illinois has issued a proclamation setting aside October 10 as "Fire Prevention" day. Why could not the managers of the picture shows do some good educational work as to the few dangers from fire on that date? They should at least make it plain, by word or deed, that a film or picture machine cannot explode.

The Essanay Company recently took pictures at the big Kankakee County fair, at Kankakee, Ill., which are receiving a great deal of advance advertising from The Kankakee Republican. They will be shown at the Court Theater as soon as released.

Manager Alger, of the Crystal, at Paxton, Ill., announces that his photoplay theater will be remodeled. The front will be an arch, and the lobby set off with plastic figures and relief work. The color scheme will be white and gold. In addition a new ventilation plant will be used and art mission lighting fixtures installed.

Jerry Knapp, of Waterloo, Iowa, has opened the Fairyland, the new moving picture theater, in that city.

BOSTON.

On Monday evening, Sept. 18, the new National Theater, Tremont Street, was opened to the public. This new house is owned by the B. F. Keith interests, and is the largest theater in Boston. It is claimed to be the largest in the world, with a seating capacity of 3,800 people. The National is built of reinforced concrete, and was built at a cost of $560,000. The house is entirely fireproof, and covers an area of 17,500 square feet. The construction and decoration of the National is plain, but artistic. The house has an orchestra and two balconies. The orchestra has 1,200 seats, which are leather air-cushioned. The first and second balcony will hold about 1,100 each. One feature of the seating arrangement is that an excellent view of the stage can be had from any seat in the house. There are 20 large boxes, with 10 on each side of the auditorium. The principal color scheme is yellow and old rose, while red is also in evidence. Orchestra chairs and floor carpets are red. There are 1,972 electric bulbs in the auditorium. Each side of the building is covered with fire-escapes, providing exits from all parts of the house. A special heating and ventilating plant keeps the air in the house pure. At the opening performance State and city officials were present, and prominent theatrical men from all the large cities were in attendance. The prices will be 5, 10 and 15 cents. The promise of the National management is a performance of vaudeville and pictures, such as has never before been attempted at the prevailing admission rates. The large seating capacity is the reason.

As far back as six months ago, this writer stated in these columns that, unless the Boston moving picture theaters were more careful in their use of lurid posters, it was only a question of time when the city officials would take a hand in the game. This was reiterated several times. This week one Boston house was forced to remove posters of the Essanay release "The Diamond Gang," released September 5. Another Boston house was forced by the officials to change its methods of advertising certain features of their show. The writer has it on the very best of authority, that lurid and sensational posters, banners, etc., are to have the prompt attention of the city officials. As this information is authentic, it will be worth the consideration of any Boston photoplay manager reading these lines.

Another week of the Kinemacolor display of motion pictures of the Coronation began at Tremont Temple, Monday, Sept. 18. This is the seventh week of the Kinemacolor reels, which speaks for itself. New views are being added as the weeks go by. The series of pictures showing the investiture of the Prince of Wales at Carnarvon Castle, are creating much favorable comment. With prices as high as $1, the house is always well filled, and the end of the Kinemacolor exhibitions are not as yet in sight.

HENRY.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

Mr. C. Francis Jenkins, who with his wife, was among the autoists in the "Ocean to Ocean Tour," is again in the city. He recounts a fine time with lots of amusing incidents, but no serious accidents. Even the ladies have no complaints to make of trials and tribulations. At all points they received the most cordial treatment. Of course the Jenkins camera was with the crowd and many thousand feet of film were exposed. The best of this will be issued by the I. M. P. Company shortly in a reel of 1,000 feet. The educational and pleasure value of this should be highly appreciated by patrons of motion picture theaters.

Wm. Airey has returned to the licensed films at his Alhambra Theater. It was this manager that dared to put a moving picture circus on the road and so pleased is he with the success that he will enter the field even deeper next spring. When a week's engagement will clear $700 there is certainly money in it. "The Fall of Troy" was the chief film featured and accompanied by fireworks and actors moving about the additionally painted scenes, the effect was grand. Mr. Airey is rather a mechanical genius and to his plans and staging is due the great success of this show. He hopes to use the "Pirates of 1920" in a similar manner.

Some of the Yankee Company made a hurried trip through the city last week.

The latest of the Ft. Meyer Military pictures, "The Altered Message," proved a big drawing card at the Empress on the day of release. A goodly number from the Fort are always in attendance.

ST. LOUIS.

A new photoplay house is being prepared at 107 W. Broadway and will open at a later date. It will probably be a 5 cent house.

Burton's illustrated storiettes have been appearing at Frank L. Talbot's Gem Theater.

The O. T. Crawford Co. is erecting another theater at Hamilton and Easton Streets. It will be similar to their many other houses, but much larger, and when completed will be the largest theater on the Crawford Circuit.

Another deal was negotiated whereby a lot at King's Highway, just north of Delmar Avenue, will be turned over to the O. T. Crawford Company for the purpose of constructing a large theater. The lot fronts 120 feet on the east side of King's Highway, which will make a nice site for a theater of this kind. The construction of the theater will be begun at once so as to be ready for the winter season. It will be one of the finest and largest theaters ever erected by the O. T. Crawford Company. The interior will be of Japanese decorations, with a circle of boxes on each floor. This will be the only theater on the O. T. Crawford Circuit with box seats. The plans call for a two story fireproof building to seat 2,000 persons. It is said a sum of $25,000 was paid for this lot. A modern cooling and ventilating system will also be installed.

Emma Weston is singing at the Lyric Theater, while several film features are also in evidence.

The Photoplay Theater, at 27th and Market Street, opened Sept. 13 with high class motion pictures. The admission is 5 cents. O. S.

LOUISVILLE.

L. J. Dittmar, president of the Kinemacolor Company, which has secured State rights for the specially colored pictures of the recent Coronation, experienced such success with the first week's run of the Kinemacolor views at the Masonic Temple Theater in Louisville that he has arranged for a supplementary week's run. The Shubert Masonic has, therefore, been engaged for this week and two Kinemacolor shows are given daily, admission rates being 25 and 50 cents.

The chain of Switow houses in the three Falls Cities is reported to be doing fine business. The Novelty, which will be opened on Fourth Avenue, in Louisville, by the Falls Cities Amusement Company, of which M. Switow is president, is being finished as rapidly as possible, and the exact date of opening of one of the finest theaters in the downtown district will be announced in the near future.

C. E. Hampson, a veteran newspaper man, who has been manager of the Crystal Theater, in Louisville, under Switow ownership, since its opening, has transferred his connections across the Ohio River from Louisville and is now general manager for the two houses, The Crystal and Grand, owned by Mr. Switow, in New Albany, Ind. Robert Jacobstein has succeeded Mr. Hampson at the Louisville Crystal. Mr. Hampson is one of the livest of live wires in the local photoplay world and is putting his new New Albany charges on a high scale.

Louisville moving picture men are making the most of every opportunity to secure a local celebrity or a scene with local color when securing their releases from the film manufacturers. The advantages of reels with local color are obvious, and when pictures showing a resident of the city "in action," as it were, can be secured, increased gate receipts are sure to result. Miss Sunshine Ijames, of the Sunshine-Tempest Trio, now starring in New York vaudeville, poses in a number of American Biograph photoplays. Incidentally, Miss Ijames is a Louisville girl. So, of course, Sunshine films are at a premium with local showhouses. Last week two Gateway City theaters featured reels portraying acting by their protege. The Orpheum, of the Princess Amusement Company circuit, ran an American Biograph release, "The Tobacco Planter," in which Miss Ijames took the stellar role, and the Majestic, of the Majestic Amusement Company chain, featured "Swords and Hearts," showing the girl from the Bluegrass metropolis in another setting.

The Broadway Amusement Company, according to Fred J. Dolle, is experiencing particularly fine business at both theaters and both airdomes. Work of construction on the $30,000 theater, which is to supplant the present Ideal Airdome of the company, on West Market Street, will be commenced about October 1, when the Airdome season closes, and will be rushed to completion. The Broadway company is closing out a six weeks' run of "Ita, the Girl Mentalist," at their various houses, pronouncing the special vaudeville attraction to be one of the biggest hits ever staged in a local photoplay theater.

The officials of the International Harvester Company of America will provide an educational entertainment with the I. H. C. reels, specially made to show every detail of implement making in the extensive plant of the company in the Lake City. The "Romance of the Reaper" will be shown.

The Ruby Amusement Company filed articles of incorporation in Louisville last week placing its capital stock at $2,100, with the maximum limit of indebtedness named at $500. The incorporators are as follows: Alfred Houston, Estella Houston, Clarence Bitzer, M. Stoecker. The concern will operate a theater for the exclusive patronage of negroes. There is one other of this kind in Louisville.

It was announced last week by T. P. Taylor, a prominent cut-rate druggist operating a chain of four stores in Louisville, that he has completed arrangements with a syndicate of capitalists whereby a combination moving picture show and office building is to be erected on Fourth Avenue, just south of Chestnut Street, on the present site of the Hast building, which is owned by Mr. Taylor. Capt. Brinton B. Davis, one of the best-known architects of the South, is now preparing plans for the new structure, which will be about four stories high and will contain on the ground floor a handsome picture theater of about 1,500 seating capacity. The site involved in the deal is one of the most valuable in the downtown district of Louisville, located a square from the heart of the retail shopping district upon the principal business thoroughfare. G. D. CRAIN, JR.

NEW ENGLAND.

Mr. Julius Cahn, proprietor of the Salem and Empire theaters, Salem, Mass., is having plenty of trouble. Mr. Cahn was unable to agree with the union, as to the number of players to constitute an orchestra. Mr. Cahn cut down the orchestra of the Salem Theater to five pieces, instead of seven, as formerly. The Musicians' Union objected, and the Salem Theater orchestra struck. The orchestra of the Empire Theater walked out in sympathy with their fellow workmen. It seems that when a theater runs vaudeville in conjunction with the pictures, an orchestra of seven pieces must be used in Salem. Manager Cahn is at present using a ladies' orchestra, composed of Salem talent, and states he will not yield to the demands of the Union. A counter-proposition of Manager Cahn's to the Union was absolutely rejected, and now Mr. Cahn refuses to treat with the Union.

Mr. J. A. Blake has leased the Colonial Theater, Dover, N. H., and is exhibiting moving pictures to good results. The Colonial should prove itself a winner under the charge of Mr. Blake, who is experienced in this line.

Messrs. Herb and Robinson are now building a new theater, to be devoted to photoplays, at New London, Conn. The house is situated on East Philadelphia Avenue, and will have a good location.

Mr. Frederick Windisch, who has been resident manager of Polis Theater, New Haven, Conn., has resigned. Manager Windisch was always popular in New Haven.

The Theater Voyons, Lowell, Mass., exhibited "Rory O'More," the great Irish picture, September 11, 12 and 13. The reel was found to be a business puller. A Kalem release.

Manager Nat Burgess, formerly in charge of the Old South and New Washington Theaters, Boston, is now managing Sheedy's Theater, Brockton, Mass. Manager Burgess found the Musicians' Union was willing to allow the theater to use an orchestra with 4 pieces. There was considerable trouble on this score last year, and Sheedy's ran without vaudeville for a time. The Union ruled that any theater using vaudeville and pictures must have a five-piece orchestra in Brockton. Many picture houses using vaudeville have been much annoyed by local unions, who demanded that a full orchestra be used, if vaudeville is presented. In many cases, the vaudeville is cast out, as the expense of a full orchestra cuts off profit to a large extent.

The Star Airdome, Meriden, Conn., exhibited the fight pictures of Ad. Wolgast and Owen Moran, the week of September 11. Business was excellent, with admission at 10c.

New Haven, Conn., is to have a new moving picture house, as G. M. Fahey is about to erect a first-class house on Congress Avenue. Admission will be 10c.

Mr. Julius Cahn, manager of the Jefferson Theater, Portland, Maine, opened the season of his "legitimate" theater, with the moving pictures of Dante's Inferno, during the week of September 11-16. Business is reported excellent, as has been the case wherever the Inferno reels are exhibited in New England.

Mr. M. C. Blumenburg, manager of the Casco Theater, Casco, Maine, is finding business excellent, with pictures and musical novelties. Mr. Blumenburg opened a first-class photoplay house at Saco, Maine, this month, and reports himself well satisfied with the opening. Pictures and songs only are used.

The Savoy Theater, Fall River, Mass., will reopen September 25, when it will present its usual attractions of "pop" vaudeville and pictures, under Marcus Low management. The Savoy is a large house, and always does fine business.

Mr. Sam Kaufman, who has been one of the executive staff of the Empire Theater, Providence, R. I., has left that house to become treasurer of the Westminster Theater, also of Providence.

Mr. Frank A. Keeney has bought the Empire Theater, Bridgeport, Conn., from Messrs. Spitz and Nathanson. Manager Keeney knows his proposition, as he had run the house before on a lease. The price is quoted to be $62,000. The house is large and first-class in every way.

Manager Jackson, of the Cumings and Bijou Theaters, Fitchburg, Mass., was presented with a beautiful floral piece by the employees of the Bijou. Manager Jackson is popular with his assistants and with the public.

James E. Moore, manager of Keith's Portland, Maine, opened his fall season of vaudeville and pictures, and reports good business.

The Olympic Theater, Lynn, Mass., has now nearly completed its enlargement and renovation, and opens on September 25, with Licensed reels and vaudeville. This house seats 3,200 people, 1,310 of which are on the floor. The house has 120 box seats, a mezzanine balcony seating 270 and the balance of seats are in the gallery. As far as is known, the Olympia is the only house in New England with its operating booth entirely outside the building. Two latest model Motiograph machines have been installed. The balconies are reached by a moving stairway. Manager A. E. Lord is personally supervising the entire details of the construction and enlargement of the Olympia. He will offer the biggest show Lynn ever saw for 10c. A detailed write-up and photograph of the Olympia Theater will be published in these columns upon the full completion of the house.

Manager F. Earle Bishop, of the Congress Theater, Portland, Maine, is making good with his new venture, and has installed the Challenge Orchestra in addition to the usual programme of pictures and songs.

Henry Rosendorf is managing the Somersworth Theater, Dover, N. H. Manager Rosendorf has found business good with pictures and songs.

MELIES.

TOMMY'S ROCKING HORSE (Oct. 12).—Little Tommy, the idol of the X I outfit, was left in charge of the boys while papa and mama took a holiday. Cook house Charlie, the leader of the cowboys, took it upon himself to see that the child had a rollicking good time. He played the bucking bronco and Tommy the rider. There was plenty of candy and other good things to eat. But the day proved too strenuous for the little fellow. The hot sun gave him a sudden stroke, and he fainted.

Great excitement prevailed at the outfit. The doctor was called from ten miles distant and pronounced the case extremely serious. He endeavored to give the child medicine, but Tommy absolutely refused to take it. He groped for something other than medicine, and still groping, fell off into unconsciousness. Dejection was written upon the faces of all the boys. They were at the end of their resources.

It took little sister Nell to fathom the child's mind, to understand what it groped for, because Nell alone knew Tommy's favorite plaything. The girl mounted a horse and galloped fifteen miles to the nearest store, to purchase Tommy's rocking horse. It was an exciting ride, during which there were many narrow escapes from fatality, but it proved most fruitful for Tommy, for when all medicine had failed, the rocking horse brought the little favorite back to consciousness and through the crisis.

BIOGRAPH.

ITALIAN BLOOD (Oct. 9)—In the little Italian home the wife feels she is neglected and apparently it seems that her husband's love is growing cold, for he has become decidedly indifferent. She, therefore, plans with her cousin to arouse his love through jealousy. At an Italian picnic, after repeated vain efforts to draw her husband's attentions toward her, she starts off with her cousin, passing in view of her husband. His fiery nature is violently aroused with jealousy, and rushing home in a towering rage, would have wreaked disaster to the entire family, for his terrible suspicion poisons his mind even against his two little children. He learns the truth, however, and realizes now to what extreme the result of his neglect would have driven him.

TRAILING THE COUNTERFEITER (Oct. 12)—This is another big mystery on which the two famous Biograph Sherlocks go to work. These two sleuths, as before, nearly catch the criminal. When they read in the newspapers of the mystery, they set out to solve it. They, of course, trail the wrong man, while real detectives run down the right one, and also arrest the sleuths for butting in. The police captain, however, lets them go, but later, when they, thinking they have discovered the crook's hiding place, blow in the wall of the police station, they are cooped up.

JOSH'S SUICIDE (Oct. 12).—Josh doesn't like the way things go at home and decides to quit and get out. Later, his wife gets what purports to be his farewell letter, which is intended to lead her to believe he has committed suicide. He, however, goes to New York to have a good time, and he does, "by gosh." The wife, believing herself a widow, makes a trip to New York with her admirer. Well, you may guess the rest.

LUBIN.

WHAT WILL BE, WILL BE (Oct. 9).—One family consists of Widow Hopkins and her daughter, Daisy; the other consists of Widower Morgan and his son, Jack. Daisy and Jack were very much in love; the same was true of their parents. It looked like wedding bells right away until Mrs. Hopkins decided to build a chicken house. The carpenters came and started erecting the building right on the lot line. To this Mr. Morgan strenuously objected. One word led to another, till finally Mr. Morgan stopped the work with an injunction.

The respective parents immediately forbade their children to meet and several times when they found their orders disobeyed they separated them by force. Then Mr. Morgan wrote to an old friend inviting his daughter, Catherine, to visit them, his intention being to bring about a match between her and Jack. Mrs. Hopkins invited Earle, the son of an old friend, to visit them, foreseeing a possible match between him and Daisy, but the two visitors became interested in each other. The air soon became thick with plots and there were secret meetings daily.

Then one moonlight night Jack dressed up as his father and made overtures to Mrs. Hopkins. He showed her the injunction papers and tore them up. Daisy dressed up as her mother and met Mr. Morgan by moonlight. So the quarrel of the old folks was fixed up without their knowing it. They told them they withdraw their objections to their children's marriage. Then their respective children had a little fun by pretending to be in love with the visitors. It was not until their wedding day that Mrs. Hopkins and Mr. Morgan discovered that Jack and Daisy were as badly in love as ever. Of course, there was a triple wedding.

THE SLAVEY'S AFFINITY (Oct. 11).—Her name was Peggy and she was just a little drudge in a boarding house. Allen Bennett, a struggling young lawyer, had a room at the boarding house. Little did he know that poor Peggy had set him on a pedestal and worshiped him from afar.

One morning she stopped him on his way downstairs and asked to be allowed to clean out his office. Allen refused at first, but finally consented on condition that she would do the work at night. Allen then stopped on the way to his office at the home of his sweetheart, Alice Lane. Arriving at his office he spent the time in wondering when he would get a client. A knock at the door—"Come in," he called, and was surprised to see Peggy with her mop and pail. While she was scrubbing a real client arrived, a Mrs. Stuart, who was seeking a divorce from her husband. She was quite hysterical and Allen had a hard time restoring her composure. While he was thus occupied the door opened unperceived by him and his sweetheart started to come in. Putting a false construction on his actions, she grew angry, rushed out of his office to her home and wrote a note telling him that all was over between them.

That evening while Allen was dressing, Peggy brought him Alice's note. Amazed, he rushed from his room and on the stairs fell over Peggy's bucket, sustaining a concussion of the brain. He dropped the note, which was found by Peggy, and read.

Peggy remembered that Mrs. Stuart had promised to call at Allen's office the next day. She was there and explained the difficulty into which Allen had come. She persuaded Mrs. Stuart to go with her to Alice's home. Alice was overcome with remorse and hurried to her lover's bedside, where a reconciliation was effected, while Peggy stood sadly outside the door realizing that Allen was not for her.

THE GAMBLER'S INFLUENCE (Oct. 12).—Tiring of work on the farm, Jack Harper quarreled with his father and went West, bidding a temporary goodbye to his sweetheart, Elsie Nugent.

In a Western barroom he was made great fun of as a tenderfoot. Tom Manly, a good-natured gambler, interfered with the cowboys' sport at Jack's expense. Manly took Jack to his cabin and invited him to share it. In a short time Jack began drinking and gambling. Having lost all his money he put up a ring that Elsie had given him and lost that. Manly being the winner. One day in a fit of remorse Jack wrote to Elsie. With a woman's intuition Elsie knew that Jack was in trouble and immediately set out to go to him.

Meanwhile Jack had seen an iron box of money loaded in the stage coach. He determined to turn robber. This happened on the very day when Elsie arrived. She met Manly and that gentleman immediately offered to take her to her lover's cabin. When they arrived there Manly saw that Jack had cut a mask from a blanket. He also missed his rifle and realized what the young fellow was about. He excused himself, jumped on his horse and followed Jack, whom he found in ambush waiting for the stage. Manly snatched the mask from Jack's face and persuaded him to come back home, telling him that Elsie was awaiting him. There was a tender meeting between the two. Elsie quickly noticed that her ring was missing from Jack's finger. She asked what had become of it. Manly answered for Jack, saying that he had been keeping the ring for the young man, and therewith he handed it back to him. Then the noble-hearted gambler slipped Jack a roll of money and then disappeared, leaving his grateful pal to enjoy better fortune than he had earned.

A HOT TIME IN ATLANTIC CITY (Oct. 14).—Count Carlsford leaves his handsome cottage in Atlantic City one day for a stroll on the sands. Two tramps gain entrance to the house, dress up in the Count's clothes, and using his visiting cards, they have one grand time of it, the cards being as good as money anywhere. The supposed noblemen had no trouble in making the acquaintance of two most beautiful girls on the beach, but when the Count sees his clothes, trouble starts and it starts good and plenty for the tramps, who finally land in jail.

AN INDIAN VESTAL (Oct. 9).—In the early days of the frontier, when the Indians were less acquainted with the ways and customs of the whites, who had not yet encroached so far upon their territory, an attack was made by a band of marauding Sioux upon an emigrant train, and only a little yellow-haired baby escaped the knife and tomahawk. As the years went by and she grew to womanhood, the tribe gradually invested her with supernatural powers, feeling more and more her sense of strangeness, difference, and isolation. She knew nothing of her origin, spoke only the guttural tongue of her captors, and yet was withheld from intimate intercourse with them by the difference in their type. Her influence over the Indians was paramount, and they obeyed her in all things, holding her sacred and apart from them, attended by an Indian maid constantly. One day as she wandered among the hills, she saw a man who at once appealed to her in a strange way as her mate. He, too, was fair and blue-eyed, and she saw in him the partner of her life, as he looked wonderingly at her beauty. She led him to her tribe, who at once bound him to the stake and would have put him to the torture had not her threats to blast them with misfortunes stayed their hands, and finally her arguments that he was her natural mate just as the handsome young Indian, the lover of her maid, was mated in all ways to her, proved effective, and she was allowed to go with the trapper to his and her own people.

TOLD IN COLORADO (Oct. 10).—Edythe Bellaires is a guest at a Colorado mountain hotel, and she is engaged to be married to Percy De-Young, a wealthy Eastern fop, who is given to flirting. John Hunter, a mining engineer, loves Kate Dawson, a dashing Western belle. Edythe's horse runs away from her and she is saved from harm by John Hunter, whose courage and manly bearing attract the girl, bored by Percy's cool manner of courtship.

Kate Dawson sees Edythe and John walking together and becomes very jealous. She determines to teach John a lesson and she flirts with Percy. John sees his sweetheart flirting with the Easterner and determines to teach her a lesson, he flirts with Edythe.

The lovers meet, each with the other's charmer, and then war is declared. In a very funny scene Kate swears vengeance on Edythe and her papa interferes. Then John meets Percy on top of a cliff. Words lead to a fight and in a thrilling scene Percy falls over the cliff. John, believing that Percy is dead, runs away. But Percy has fallen into a clump of bushes, and he is rescued by some miners. Haunted by visions of his imaginary crime, John returns, and coming face to face with Percy, John believes that he is seeing a ghost, and he runs away, followed by his sweetheart Kate, who captures him after an exciting foot race. Kate explains and the lovers are happy.

OUTGENERALED (Oct. 12).—Bert Howe is in love with Bessie Darrow, who returns his love, but whose over ambitious father has promised her in marriage to the Count de Gribelin.

All begging and pleading on Bert's part is of no avail, for Bessie's father remains obdurate, and he is badly discouraged until he receives a letter from Bessie telling him of her father's intention to take her on a cruise in their yacht. She begs him to do something desperate and save her from having to marry the Count.

He thinks hard, and finally hits upon a plan, which, with the help of the Captain of Darrow's yacht, is carried out. Disguised as a sailor, Bert obtains work on the yacht, and in the course of the voyage, which is a rough one, discloses his identity to Ruth, who is overjoyed.

The poor Count, however, is terribly seasick, and begs to be put ashore. So Bert launches a boat, and rows him and his valet to land, where he leaves them. Darrow, too, is seasick, and unaware that the Count is not on board, orders the Captain to weigh anchor.

The Count, from land, sees the yacht get under way, and though he frantically tries to attract its attention, his efforts avail him nothing, and the "Arrow" sails peacefully on her way to port.

Later the Count is picked up by the steamer "Ontario," and immediately sends a wireless message to Darrow. Darrow is frantic, and when the Count identifies Bert as the man who left him on shore, his fury is boundless, and he forthwith discharges Bert, who gets his bag and prepares to leave the yacht.

Bessie gets into the boat with Bert, who then tears off his disguise. Both Darrow and the Count are confounded, but it is too late, and one week later, Bert and Bessie, who are now married, return home, and sue for the forgiveness which they know will not be withheld.

TRADE MARK

Your motion picture show is a sure shot for success if you install the

EDISON KINETOSCOPE

the one invented and perfected by

TRADE MARK

Thomas A Edison

There is no element of chance in the motion picture business if you start right. Starting right means starting with a good machine—then make your program as good as the machine—and there isn't a fraction of a possibility of failure.

The Edison Kinetoscope is by far the best motion picture machine made. It has eliminated the one great drawback to motion pictures—the objectionable flicker that is so hard on the eyes. The pictures it projects are clear, steady and true to life. It is the safest machine made. It is easiest to operate —all parts are readily accessible. It will outlast several cheap machines. You will find the Edison Kinetoscope by far the most economical motion picture investment, in the end.

this mammoth sweetmeat was successfully constructed recently by Mr. Nicholas Simon, of Appleton, Wis., it proved to be an object of world-wide interest. The cheese will be exhibited at the National Dairy Show in Chicago this fall, and later will be cut into sections and sold.

Some idea of its magnitude may be had when one considers that over seventy-two tons of milk, 330 pounds of cheese salt, and thirty-one pounds of rennet were used to make this cheese weigh six tons and over. The milk came from 8,000 pure-bred Holstein and Guernsey cows, through the agency of some 12,000 farmers. The cheese is over eight feet in diameter and is valued at $7,500.

THE MISTRESS OF THE HACIENDA DEL CERRO (Oct. 9).—Richard Young, an American immigrant, and his sick wife find shelter at the Hiacenda del Cerro. Dolores, daughter of Esteban Hernandez, owner of the Hacienda Del Cerro, is fascinated by the young American and attempts to win him from his wife, but her advances are scorned by the honest American. This incites the vindictive Dolores to revenge herself on Richard by having Gray Bear, an Indian Chief, abduct Richard's wife. Dolores summons Gray Bear to her home and makes known her plan. The Indian apparently becomes a willing tool, but when he arrives that night with four or five braves, instead of kidnapping the American's wife they capture Dolores, with whom the Indian chief is madly in love. A prisoner in Gray Bear's tent, Dolores is informed she is about to become the Indian's wife. The rescue is splendidly portrayed.

FOR THE FLAG (Oct. 11).—Rosalie, a patriotic French-Canadian girl, makes a French flag and takes it to the nearby fort. The flag is raised with due ceremony and the Commandant congratulates her upon her patriotism. Lieutenant Francois, Rosalie's sweetheart, is strong in his praise of the hardy little patriot. On her way back to her father's cabin she comes across a Blackfoot Indian who has sprained his ankle so badly that he cannot walk. The tender-hearted girl takes off the neck cloth she is wearing and quickly binds up the Indian's ankle. Bidding him to be patient she runs to her father's cabin and quickly brings Father Bantry, a Jesuit missionary, and between them the Indian is helped to Rosalie's home.

One day while the Indian was convalescing he notes the pretty little locket Rosalie is wearing attached to a chain around her neck and asks to see the inside of it. The good-natured girl complies with his request. In a few days the Indian returns to his people, thanking the generous palefaces for their kind treatment.

Rosalie hearing the tramp of soldiers opens the door of her cabin and finds a large body of soldiers marching toward the French fort. Taking a short cut to the fort she communicates the news to Francois, who is temporarily in charge of the fort. After a fierce onslaught by the English, Francois seeing his small force greatly outnumbered, surrenders to the enemy. Entering the stockade the English quickly lower the French flag and replace it with their own. Rosalie is angered at the disrespect shown to the French flag. Grabbing it up as it is thrown on the ground she makes her escape, but is followed and arrested. Francois incensed at the treatment of Rosalie, makes a daring escape to secure aid. While on his way he is captured by Indians, taken to their camp and condemned to death. While preparations are being made for the execution, the Blackfoot Indian who had been befriended by Rosalie and her father recognizes the locket that Rosalie has placed around Francois' neck. Explanations take place and the grateful Indian orders Francois released and they organize a party to recapture the French fort. The Indian stratagem finally wins. The French soldiers are liberated, Rosalie is restored to her sweetheart and the English are allowed to depart without their firearms.

THE SMUGGLERS (Oct. 13).—At the opening of our story Old Tom and Billie are off for a two days' fishing trip. Rose, Old Tom's daughter, goes along the beach to gather mussels. Just ahead of Rose hidden by monster boulders is a party of smugglers surreptitiously landing a party of Chinese. Rose unexpectedly comes across the smugglers and is captured. Rose is dragged to the smugglers' rendezvous, where her death is planned, as the smugglers fear she will inform the revenue officers against them. During the night Rose escapes. Writing a note on a small piece of paper she places it in a bottle and throws it out to sea. Old Tom and Billie while drawing in their net pull up the bottle, read the message, put on all sail and overtake the revenue cutter. The officer in charge heading a party of husky sailors makes a safe landing in the smugglers' cove and effects the capture of the complete gang.

REPARATION (Oct. 10).—David Warren and his sweetheart, Stella Graham, are country lovers. As tokens of their engagement they exchange a ring and a necklace, the latter with a locket. At the county fair the next day Warren, who with Stella is seeing the sights, is persuaded to make a bet in a crooked gambling game. Warren, of course, loses and is finally persuaded to make another bet on the necklace given him by Stella. No sooner is the necklace out of his hands than the confidence man and his pal turn and run, evading a constable, who runs on the scene at this time. Warren is arrested for gambling and is dragged by his sweetheart and her family, but is given no opportunity for an explanation. Later, disgraced in the eyes of his sweetheart, he runs away to the city. Some time later Jake Sharpe, the confidence man, who has been the cause of Warren's downfall, tries a new game, selecting farmer Graham for his victim. Jake falls in love with Stella and refuses to cheat her father. Later, Stella sees the necklace she gave to Warren, and Jake is forced to confess where he got it. Jake then gives up all claim to the girl and returning to the city hunts out Warren and sends him back to his country sweetheart.

GET-RICH HALL AND FORD (Oct. 12).—Hall and Ford are two tramps who escape from the workhouse. In order to make good their getaway they ingeniously join a marathon race and win prizes as the winners. By other slick confidence games they soon become rich. They then buy a mansion and settle down to enjoy the fruits of their labors, but are captured by two dog-catchers, who have read of a reward for their arrest.

THE DEACON'S REWARD (Oct. 13).—Deacon Jones, a pillar in the village church, and the richest man in town, has a worthless nephew, who he is finally forced to disinherit. The deacon becomes lonely and resolves to take up some sort of employment as a pastime. He becomes a collector of bad accounts for a house-furnishing store and causes the discharge of a young clerk in an office, when the latter's employer reprimands the clerk for not paying his debts. By an odd coincidence the old deacon, in performing an act of kindness is led to the clerk's home, by the clerk's little girl, where he is shocked at the poverty he sees. His sympathy is further aroused when he finds he is the cause of fresh sorrow for the family and finally resolves to take them to his home. This proves to be a wise move, as the spendthrift nephew, now a comman thief, has planned to rob the old man, but is caught by the clerk, who also saves the old man's life from the murderous intentions of his worthless relation.

THE STAGE-DRIVER'S DAUGHTER (Oct. 14).—Old Jim Lacey and his daughter operate a stage coach in the West. One day, Alice, the girl, meets Tom Percival, a prospector, green from the East, and they fall in love. A few weeks later Tom writes Alice that he has struck it rich and for her to accompany her father on the stage coach that day and she can ride with him to the claim office. In the meantime, the Riley boys, a gang of roughs, have learned of Percival's rich strike and plan to jump the tenderfoot's claim. They persuade the bartender at the inn to "fix" Lacey's whiskey, planning to beat the coach to the claim office. However, they have not reckoned with Tom and Alice. Alice, when she finds her father made unconscious by the "knockout drops," drives the six horses herself and with Tom perched on the rear end of the coach to keep back the Rileys, they ride to the claim office and the claim is filed.

HOW MRS. MURRAY SAVED THE AMERICAN ARMY (Oct. 10).—After General Washington had gained his headquarters on Harlem Heights, a hurried dispatch arrived, stating that a large British force under General Howe and Goveronr Tryon were crossing Manhattan in order to cut off part of the army left to protect lower New York. Hastily summoning General Putnam, Washington orders him to bring the force to Harlem Heights. Putnam and his aide, Captain Bob, galloped down to New York, gathered up the command and started them on their hasty march to Harlem. Stopping at Mrs. Murray's house for a moment, they learn that General Howe is only ten minutes behind them and Putnam urges his men on, though Captain Bob is loath to leave his sweetheart, Faith, Mrs. Murray's daughter. Scarcely has the American army disappeared from view when the British come marching on. General Howe, dismounting, asks Mrs. Murray as to the whereabouts of the Americans. But that loyal woman merely states that they are far beyond pursuit and invites Howe and Tryon into the house to partake of some refreshments. This they do, and through the efforts of Mrs. Murray and her daughter, they spend two hours in a delightful visit. Meanwhile, the American army being safe, General Putnam is desirous to know what has become of his pursuers. Bob volunteers to find out, and meeting an old friend on the road, he borrows a suit of civilian clothes and thus disguised, presents himself to Faith. He finally persuades her to allow him to act as their servant in serving the British officers, and while they are drinking the health of their delightful hostess, he manages to steal a copy of their plans and hide it under the wine pitcher. The plans are missed. Bob signals Faith to take away the tray bearing the plans and submits to being searched, but his disguise being discovered, he strikes out boldly, and before the officers recover from their surprise, he has seized the plans and is safely beyond reach. He reaches Washington's headquarters somewhat disheveled, but triumphant, and is promptly rewarded for his bravery.

MAE'S SUITORS (Oct. 11).—Mae Thornton, a young heiress, is besieged by a number of admirers at her residing place, so much so that her father buys a yacht. As the captain is in need of a crew, he advertises for it in the daily newspapers.

Mae innocently apprises each one of her suitors of her father's intentions. Having seen the captain's advertisement in the paper for a number of sailors, the young men apply at once for the position and are accepted. All goes well on the yacht until father discovers that the sailors are no other than Mae's suitors, and gets angry. He is now willing to give his daughter's hand to the one who will save her from drowning. So she throws her hat and veil overboard, yells and hides. The sailors, hearing her screams, and seeing her hat and veil in the water, jump overboard, with the exception of Jack, who cannot swim. Jack seems to be the one man Mae really loves, so her father offers his daughter's hand to him. When the sailors get aboard the yacht again, they see the joke and all ends happily.

AT THE THRESHOLD OF LIFE (Oct. 13).—There are two young people of wealth and social position, the girl with an unselfish love for the unhelped little ones of the city and the youn man intent upon his own enjoyment of life in his own circle.

There are scenes showing her work and its effect upon the little ones and also the contrasting lives of the children who have no kindergarten and who must play in a crowded tenement room or in the middle of the street. One little lame child follows the girl into the kindergarten, but, as is the case in all of our big cities, the class is overcrowded, the teachers cannot take care of more and they are obliged to send the little chap away. He meets with an accident in the street and the young millionaire is thus made to realize the value of the work of the girl he loves.

In the last scene the young man makes good by presenting the convalescent little boy with a sizable check for the kindergarten cause, thereby winning the apologies and the love of the girl.

HER WEDDING RING (Oct. 14).—Lulu, the daughter of an old miner, is much annoyed by the advances of Wild Dick, a dissolute gambler, who, in spite of her indignation, persists in his unwelcome attentions.

One day she finds her father lying unconscious, having had a paralytic stroke at the mine. Unable to carry him alone, she is forced to accept the assistance of Dick, who has followed her, in getting him to the cabin.

Her father not showing any signs of recovery, she asks Dick to go for a doctor. This he refuses to do, saying that it is useless. She attempts to go herself, but he prevents her and she sinks down beside her father. Here Dick makes her a proposition. He will go for help if she will promise to marry him. This she indignantly refuses to do, but fearing her father will surely die if he doesn't receive medical aid, she finally consents. Dick makes her swear it upon the Bible. He gallops away and returns with the doctor, who, after a short examination, pronounces her father dead. Dick recalls her oath and makes her keep her promise to marry him. But Dick remains the same worthless character, drinking and gambling, and is really brutal to Lulu. One day a party of Lulu's friends from the East arrive, among them a young man who falls violently in love with her. Dick has returned home unknown to Lulu, when he sees her and Tom coming up the path. He conceals himself and overhears the young man declare his love to her. He is about to shoot them when he hears Lulu dismissing Tom. Her lot is not a happy one, but she will remain faithful to her marriage vow. Dick realizes the sterling worth of his wife and resolves to make himself worthy of her and win her love.

To this end he gives up drinking and gambling and goes to work in the old mine. Lulu notes the change in him and through his kind attentions is drawn to him. But Dick feels unworthy and thinking he can never win her, becomes discouraged. One day he strikes gold at the mine in great quantities, and telling Lulu of her good fortune, tells her now that she is provided for, he will set her free, but this last sacrifice completely wins her and she tells him she wants him to stay.

VITAGRAPH.

DADDY'S BOY AND MAMMY (Oct. 9).—Colonel Mason, a Confederate, is wounded and taken prisoner by the Union army, and is placed in their hospital for treatment. He escapes and manages to get into his home, which is surrounded by Union soldiers.

His son, Bobbie, dons the clothes of the son of the colored servant, named Mammy, which are rather ragged, and applies for a position as drummer boy in the Union ranks. He is accepted and is given a suit of Union clothes. Although too large for him. He manages to get into the house to his father, who quickly puts on his son's regimentals. He then passes out of the house as a Union soldier. Back with his regiment again, he relates his experience to his comrades, who immediately appoint Bobbie as one of their drummer boys.

After the war, Bobbie and his father return home, where they are greeted warmly by all.

THE MISSING WILL (Oct. 10).—James Halsey, a wealthy old man, marries a young wife, who has no use for him but plenty of use for his money. Mr. Halsey has a nephew, a namesake, James Braddon, to whom he wills one-half of his fortune. Braddon is a hard-working young attorney, assisted by a very pretty stenographer, Bessie Dallard, with whom he is very much in love. The wealthy uncle calls to see his nephew on business and suddenly drops dead of apoplexy. James Braddon goes to see his uncle's widow in regard to the will. He cannot find it, as Mrs. Halsey has hidden it with intentions of destroying it.

Young Braddon is obliged to discharge Miss Dallard through lack of funds. Mrs. Halsey goes out for a ride in her limousine. While passing through a side street, she tears the will up and throws the fragments into the roadway. Bessie Dallard, who is out walking, crosses the road just as the automobile passes, and sees the flying bits of paper. She picks up several pieces of the paper and readily sees that it is a will. She gathers up all the pieces: puts them together, and is surprised to discover that she has before her the missing will for which Jame Braddon has been searching. She at once makes her way to her young lover's office and places the will before him. It is not long before Miss Dallard and the young lawyer confront the aunt and accuse her of her greed and baseness. Then they hurry to the surrogate's office, state their case and the mising will is soon recorded. The next step they take is into the adjoining office of the City Hall, where they secure a marriage license, preparatory to making Miss Bessie Dallard Mrs. James Braddon.

THE INDIAN FLUTE (Oct. 11).—Wild Fox, a young Indian brave, is madly in love with Awanta, an Indian princess, in love with a white trapper, who, in turn, is very much in love with her. The young Indian tries by his subtle pleadings and gentle woolngs to win her consent to become his wife. Music is one charm which he thinks she cannot resist. Straightway he cuts from a willow bow overhanging the river a twig, from which he makes a flute, which he plays with a skill and tone which has always meen magic to those who listen to its soothing and entrancing strains.

Awanta soon tires of his music and starts to leave him. He pleads with her, but she points to the tepees in the distance, on the cliffs that overlook the water falls below. Wild Fox prays to the Great Spirit for aid and awaits an answer to his prayer. The young princess meets her white trapper and when he asks her to become his wife, she consents. Bidding farewell to her tribe forever, she enters the white man's canoe and is soon passing down the river on her way to her future home.

Wild Fox, while standing upon the precipice, sees his love passing away from him with the white man, and sadly makes his way down the cliff to the edge of the river, where he gets in his canoe, pushes out into the middle of the stream, throws his paddle away and slowly drifts down to the great falls, over which he dashes into the turbulent rapids and on and on to the surging whirlpool at the foot of which, shortly afterwards, his upturned canoe is found, while Awanta and her husband peacefully and happily proceed on their way to dream of life and love, reflected in the waning sunset before them.

ANSWER OF THE ROSES (Oct. 13).—Antonio, an old peasant, lives in his cottage with his son Nello, and his two nieces, Nina and Stella. Nello fervently loves Nina and is loved by her in return.

SPECIAL NOTICE. On Friday, October 6th, the Edison Company will release a three reel production, consisting of a dramatized version of the great story, "Foul Play," by Charles Reade. Exhibitors running a three or four reel program are in a position to make these releases the subject of a "special feature night with lecture." In view of the decided successes scored by artistic films of greater length, both in moving picture houses and in the big theaters of the country, it seems quite probable that such a feature will prove a source of profit. I have prepared a set of press notices and matter for announcement slides, which will be sent to every exhibitor who wishes to have them in connection with my services as lecturer. If unable to come myself, I am in a position to send a competent substitute, but will endeavor to answer all calls personally as far as possible. Send applications at earliest possible moment.

Stella is passionately in love with Nello, who treats her as a child. Nello and Nina plight their troth with the red roses of June, and they are the one emblem of undying love with them.

Nello gets an offer from a wealthy uncle to go to Naples to study a profession. He accepts, and promises to write Nina, bidding her to send him, from time to time, a red rose, to tell him that she still loves him. Two years pass and old Antonio dies. It is too far for Nello to come from Naples to visit his cousins, but he tells the girls to keep the cottage, live in it and he will supply their needs. Stella's love for Nello grows stronger and she resolves to separate him and Nina if she can. She goes to the post office, receives the letters written by Nello to Nina, destroys them and then tells Nina that Nello has not written her. Nina, thinking herself neglected, begins to pine and fade. Nello feels neglected and uncared for by Nina, and he writes her a final letter, telling her if she is tired of him to send him a white rose, and if she still loves him, to send him a red rose. This letter is opened by Stella, who straightway sends Nello a white rose.

Nina goes into a decline and the doctor considers her condition very serious. Stella is stricken with remorse, makes her way to Naples, sees Nello, and on her knees, confesses her deception, beseeches his forgiveness and begs him to return to her sister. He does so, but none too soon to save Nina's life, for she is well night heartbroken. On the return of her lover Nina recovers. Happiness is restored, and Stella, through her penitence and kind attention to her sister, is forgiven by the young lovers.

BY WAY OF MRS. BROWNING (Oct. 14).—Dr. Chester North asks Eleanor Eastman to become his wife. She tells her mother, who is as much pleased as her daughter. The next morning, while the doctor is busy in his office, a poor chorus girl enters and asks him to attend her little sister, who is dying. He readily consents and is hurriedly making his way to her home. Eleanor, riding down the street, sees Chester with the chorus girl. At noon on the same day, Chester sends Eleanor her engagement ring, and although she is disturbed by what she saw in the morning, she forgets it when she beholds the glistening solitaire. Chester asks her to go to the matinee with him. She tells him she will go and at two o'clock he has not arrived. Eleanor peevishly decides to go to the theater herself.

The doctor cannot resist the pleadings of the little girl for her sister, who is taking part in the very play that Eleanor is witnessing. The doctor goes to the theater, and while waiting at the stage door for her coming, Eleanor sees him again with the chorus girl. She returns her engagement ring to Chester with a note that she does not wish to have anything more to do with him. Dr. North tries to explain, but she will not listen. He throws the ring upon the office floor and, taking the rose which she has pinned on his coat the night before, destroys it.

The chorus girl happens in at this moment to pay the doctor. He refuses to accept compensation and she notices his agitation, picks up Eleanor's note from the floor and learns the cause. She hurries to the home of Miss Eastman, tells her of the doctor' kindness and how he saved her little sister's life. Eleanor, ashamed of herself, tries to make amends. She strikes upon a happy idea from Mrs. Browning's poem. She writes: "And the first time I will send a white rose bud for a guerdon." Enclosing a white rose, she sends it to Chester, but he refuses to respond. Again she writes: "And the second time a rose." She accompanies this with a full-blown rose, similar to the one she gave him the night of their engagement. To this Chester responds in person, and together they read:

"And the third time I will bend my pride and whisper, 'Pardon,' when he comes to claim my love."

There is but one answer that is silently expressed as they lovingly glance into each other's eyes.

PATHE.

LITTLE ANIMAL TRAINER (Oct. 9).—The family of a traveling showman is utterly ruined by the death of the father, who was the animal trainer, and starvation and hardship stares them in the face, until finally his little son decides to take his place. The mother, though fearful of the outcome, makes him a little uniform and finally the great day arrives. By exhibiting himself outside the tent a great crowd is gathered. The youthful trainer appears before his audience and goes through a series of most interesting exercises with his animals. He enters in succession the cages of the tigers, lions, hyenas, leopards, etc. The fact that he actually enters these wild animal dens lends great realism to the picture.

ONE ON THE MASHER (Oct. 11).—There is a measly, moth-eaten looking old gentleman who casts his optics on as pretty a bunch of skirts as ever blew down the broad white way. The antique guy is under the erroneous impression that he has caught a flash from the dream's eye and he trails the object of his sudden affection along the avenue to her dwelling place and gets the front panel closed in his face for his pains. Inside the residence the charmer is handing a long line of explanations to her natural protector. Hubby is hep in a minute and decides to put one over on the old beau. Tipping his wife off as to the proper modus operandi, he allows her to beat it into the street where the old scout is on the watch. She leads him a merry chase, finally bringing him back again to the house. In the meantime Hubby has bought a bottle of dope labeled "poison." When the aged fossil breaks into the presence of his inamorata. Husband appears and forces him to gulp down the medicine. Great excitement reigns. The lovelorn ancient thinks he has taken poison, but everything comes out well when it is discovered that he has simply taken a little essence of red pepper. The moral is: "They all look good when they are far away."

ROMANCE OF THE DESERT (Oct. 12).—An American foreman of a construction gang is sunstruck and in his delirium wanders away from the camp into the desert, where he is found by Indians. A year later, having no recollection of his former identity, and to all intents and purposes an Indian, he wanders with a pretty Indian maid into the general store in town. Around his neck is a crucifix, the only link connecting with the past. In the store is a young postmistress, who, a couple of years before, had given the crucifix to the aphasia victim. This crucifix leads to the man's identification and to the restoring of his memory and a final reunion between the postmistress and her lost love.

RAFFLES CAUGHT (Oct. 13).—At a soirée our hero meets a beautiful woman who lives in the house where the soirée is held. He is amazed at the magnificence of her jewels, and, his cupidity aroused, decides to rob the house. That night when the guests are leaving he conceals himself behind one of the curtains and waits there until the moment when all is still through the house; then with stealthy steps he steals up the staircase, seeking somewhere the sumptuous jewels. But he is seen, as he is working with the deft fingers of a trained thief to pick the lock of the escritoire; his foot comes in contact with a chair and the slight noise arouses the mistress of the house, who is attempting to sleep in the next room. Through an aperture she watches Raffles at work, and then, showing herself and beguiling him with her eyes, she coaxes him into her room, where with a woman's wiles she detains him while the maid goes for the police.

MAROONED (Oct. 14).—The captain of a sailing craft about to leave on a long voyage drives his son away because of his refusal to accompany him; later on at sea the captain is overpowered by a mutinous crew, marooned on a desert island with the first and second mates. The mutineers, sailing on and on over the stormy seas, finally put in at a port, where they witness a clever fight, the hero of which they take aboard and subsequently make him captain. This is the old captain's son, who, realizing that it is his father's craft, fathoms the mystery of the captain's disappearance and finally succeeds in rescuing him. The mates have died and the old man has lost his mind with the hardships he has borne; but the picture of the boy's mother brings him back to his senses and a happy reunion results.

ECLIPSE.

PARDONED BY THE GOVERNOR (Oct. 11).—Marco, chief of a band of brigands, orders his men to free the governor and his daughter whom they have in custody.

In gratitude, the governor's daughter gives a ring to the highwayman.

Later in Marco's career, when a price is set upon his head, and he is captured, the governor is able to save his life.

MAKING CHEDDAR CHEESE (Oct. 11).—Every stage in the production is here illustrated in such detail that one can trace the various changes the milk undergoes until the cheese is ready for market.

Pretty milking scene. A herd of fine cows yield the milk which forms the basis of the cheese.

Placed in large churns the milk is mixed with chemicals which cause it to coagulate.

It is then broken up and the whey run off.

The resulting curd is cut into square blocks and ground down in a special machine.

The powdered curd is placed in vats and pressure applied.

The result. The finishing cloth placed around a fine round cheddar cheese, ready for the market.

GAUMONT.

Note.—The Gaumont releases scheduled for week of October 9 were delayed owing to accident to S. S. Olympic. Synopses that should have been published in this issue will be published next week.

IT CONCERNS YOU!

It is a matter of Dollars and Cents the Exhibitors Poster Service will appeal to you and every other motion picture exhibitor in the land and. We deliver to any theater in the United States 20 posters, representing the entire Licensed output at a rate of $1.00 per week, express prepaid. Think it over. We believe only one of the 20 posters to have the pulling power to attract sufficient box office returns to pay for the entire week's service. Exhibitors owning a circuit of theaters, or using their cities as move up pics, can, by each house paying one rate, secure their individual poster service at a mere trifle. Arrange this between yourselves. We want one service to go the farthest and do the most good. It is with this idea we entered the poster service field and along these lines we have already done a positive good to the motion picture business in general. Eventually you will use our service. Why not now? If you have not as yet arranged for the use of attractive and pleasing posters to post in the lobby of your theater, do so at once. Call, write or wire. Our plan met with instantaneous success and we have single customers taking by high as ten sets of posters on a standing order weekly.

RELIANCE.

WEIGHED IN THE SCALE (Sept. 30).—The Sheriff is broken hearted when Allen appears and wins the love of Ethel, his sweetheart. After the marriage Allen's love cools, and he lapses into dissolute ways. His firm fails, and the Sheriff secretly persuades a friend to give him employment. He yields to temptation and steals a large sum of money. His dissipation has shattered his health, and the Sheriff circulates a petition to secure his release owing to his physical condition, without success. Ethel and her mother are in poverty, and he assists them financially. Allen passes away, and a year later Ethel gives her love to the Sheriff, who has been weighed in the scale and found not wanting.

WINNING PAPA'S CONSENT (Oct. 4).—Herbert elopes with a pretty actress and notifies his parents. Papa is furious, jumps into his auto and rushes to their apartment. Herbert is ordered home, but comes back with his mother. In the meantime the tears of the young bride have melted papa's heart and he is tenderly assuaging her grief when his wife walks in and catches him. After a scene full of humorous situations, forgiveness is given on all sides and the actress-bride wins the day.

A QUIET EVENING (Oct. 4).—After a hard day's work, O'Brien hopes to spend a quiet evening reading. His wife's callers, his daughter's sweetheart singing, the cook's cop, his son's telephone calls, etc., drive him from room to room, until in despair and anger he rushes from the house.

BISON.

THE RED MAN'S PENALTY (Oct. 3).—The Indians protest against the poor food furnished them and complain to the Commissioner. He knocks the spokesman down, and the Indians plan revenge. A sudden attack is made on the Commissioner's office, and he and the guard are massacred. The troops go in pursuit of the Indians, and a thrilling running battle is fought, in which the red men are overpowered.

RANGE JUSTICE (Oct. 6).—The renegade is caught stealing a blanket and is soundly whipped by Foster. Burning with anger, he tries to intercept Ethel Foster, but she strikes him across the face with her quirt and gallops on. He pursues her and snatches her from the galloping horse, and turns his captive over to the Indians. Her father sees the act through field glasses, the troops are notified and the rescue party thunders into the Indians' camp. They take to their canoes and the soldiers swim their horses into the stream and engage them in battle, rescuing the captive.

IMP.

THE SENTINEL ASLEEP (Oct. 9).—The story is taken from one of the incidents in the life of Napoleon Bonaparte, the famous little fighting general. It is a matter of history that Napoleon was a stickler for discipline and any infringements of his orders met with summary punishment.

A soldier doing picket duty on an outpost is visited by his sweetheart. He is nearly exhausted from his long vigil and loss of sleep. The meeting is an affectionate one and the girl offers to bring him food and drink, and steals away.

The soldier lies down at the base of a haystack and is soon sound asleep. Napoleon has an attack of insomnia and is walking about inspecting the sentries. He approaches the post vacated by the soldier and is surprised to see his rifle lying on the ground. Napoleon is angry and is about to prod the sleeper with his sword when he takes compassion on him, shoulders the musket and paces the beat, wearing the shako of the recalcitrant sentinel.

The girl returns with the food and, not recognizing the great commander, fondles him, thinking it is her lover. Napoleon prevents recognition for a time, but finally reveals his identity. The soldier awakes with a start, rises and is paralyzed with fear. He is granted clemency on account of the circumstances and Napoleon walks away, leaving the lovers happy.

THE LAST G. A. R. PARADE AT ROCHESTER, N. Y. (Oct. 9).—The ranks of the survivors of the Civil War are thinning each year and at every National encampment the attendance has been lessened. The last encampment, held at Rochester, N. Y., was a notable one, inasmuch as the grand parade marked the closing of that feature of the yearly gatherings of the veterans. This has been decided upon owing to the fact that the old heroes are becoming too feeble to stand the hardships of the long march and in the future they will meet, with campfire and song, and with speeches and reminiscences while they renew old acquaintance. One by one they are passing away, to be remembered as gallant soldiers who fought for what they believed was right.

The Imp company, with commendable enterprise, had camera men on the ground at Rochester and preserved in film the last big demonstration of the old "Boys in Blue" that will ever be held. There were upwards of 25,000 men in line of march and the views are excellent ones. The parade was viewed by President Taft, General Grant, as well as the department officers of the Grand Army of the Republic. (Copyrighted 1911 by Independent Moving Pictures Co. of America.)

THE BETTER WAY (Oct. 12).—Louis Perry is discharged from the penitentiary, having served his sentence. He immediately resumes relations with his evil companions, being a leader in the criminal acts.

One day he happens to meet Lillian Garvey, a Salvation Army worker. One of his companions insults her and he resents it and incurs his enmity. Lillian is the only good woman he has known for years and he learns to love her. Her influence tempts him to abandon the life he is leading, and he attends the services and becomes converted.

Just at this juncture Madeline Raymond, a woman of the under world, who was his sweetheart before he was arrested, again comes into his life. He tries to secure honorable employment, but fate, in the shape of vigilant officers, interferes. They know him for a criminal and warn employers against him. Lillian is loyal in her faith in him and they are married.

A small boy is injured by a motor car and Louis takes him to his home. When he arrives he finds Madeline, who has called on his wife and told her all. The revelation has no effect on the faithful wife and she has nothing but pity for the abandoned woman. A physician is called to attend the boy and Madeline resolves to be revenged. She places her purse in a dresser drawer and then summons a policeman, announcing that Louis has robbed her. The physician sees the woman secrete the purse. The policeman arrives and recognizes Louis as a jailbird and is about to arrest him when he notices the injured boy, which is his child. The doctor clears Louis of the charge of theft and the officer congratulates him on his reformation and praises his devoted wife. The incident makes a vivid impression on Madeline and she is resolved to lead an honest life. (Copyrighted 1911 by Independent Moving Pictures Co. of America.)

AMBROSIO.

THE LAW OF RETALIATION (Sept. 30).—The son of Galeazzo is slain in the dead of night, during the siege of the city. Mad with grief and rage, he vents his revenge on a captive whom his men bring in. He demands a large ransom for the return of the prisoner, whose mother disposes of her jewels to raise the money. The bag of gold is dropped over the wall and the youth is permitted to climb a ladder leading to the wall where his people await him, but as he nears the top Galeazzo jerks it away and the climber falls to his death.

WRESTLING AND WRESTLERS (Oct. 4).—The first part of the film shows the training stunt, at Raicevich's Villa, the massage, etc. The champions are then introduced and the men get into action.

First bout: Jourdan, the French champion, vs. Lopmajar, the Austrian champion. Second bout: Emile Raicevich, Italian, vs. Shinaplier, the Prussian champion. Third bout: John Raicevich, champion of the world, vs. Anglio, the Black Giant of Martinique.

THANHOUSER.

THE HIGHER LAW (Oct. 9).—A young minister silently loves the school teacher of the village. She, however, looks upon him merely as a friend—because a sea captain has her heart. When the captain returns from a voyage he asks his sweetheart to become his wife. She consents, and the young minister is given the ungrateful task of performing the ceremony.

Soon after the wedding the captain goes off on a long voyage, from which he never returns. The news is brought back that he was drowned. The woman is left friendless and helpless with a child. It is impossible for her to live on without a source of revenue, so she decides she will hunt for a position. But first she determines to find a suitable home for her child.

After mental anguish she makes up her mind that the minister would be the only proper person to whom she could entrust her baby. She then leaves the baby and a note on the doorstep of the minister's home and later assures herself by peeping in at the minister's study, that her child was welcome. She then wends her way into the uncertain world.

As she is sitting near a dock with tear-stained cheeks, she makes the acquaintance of a wealthy but crippled old woman. After a few questions, the woman asks her to take the position of companion and secretary and live with her, as she has no friends or relatives. After seven years of close association, the old woman dies and bequeathes her fortune to her secretary.

Now that she is rich, she returns to the country village to claim her own. The child in the meantime has grown and the minister who has been more than a father to her, loves the child. He points out that the mother has forfeited her rights because of her unnatural neglect of her offspring.

The unexpected position of the minister nearly breaks her heart. The minister, wooed by a spirit of defiance, asks the mother to come with him to Sunday school, where she may pick out her child. Of course the mother finds this an impossible task and is forced to acknowledge the justice of the minister's position.

The mother is overcome with sorrow and remorse. With heaving breast and eyes streaming with hot tears, she finds her way to some secluded spot where she is nearly overcome by her motherly suffering. But here the great power draws the child from the church and leads her to comfort her suffering mother.

THE TEMPTER AND DAN CUPID (Oct. 13).—The myth, which is beautifully told on the screen, shows the stages of the struggle between the little love God and his inveterate enemy, Satan. Although Satan has the better of the struggle for a time, because Cupid, "who makes the world go round by love," and naturally is a busy sprite, is compelled to temporarily neglect his proteges. He comes to the rescue, however, at the right moment and the devil is thwarted.

Satan in the picture, begins his operations by luring the young man away from church by showing him a vision of his boon companions enjoying themselves at the gambling tables. The King of Hell with his evil influence draws the young man to the gambling den. At the gambling tables, when luck goes against him, the evil spirit appears and induces the young man to rob his father. The father, however, appears in time to protect his son from losing all of an immense sum of money.

Thus frustrated, Satan brings forward a Siren, who lures the boy from his sweetheart. In this way he is tricked into a duel with the Siren's lover and we soon find him with sword in hand facing his rival and Satan at his back leering with delight.

But Satan had not counted on the energy of Cupid. There is an old saying that "Hell hath no fury like a woman scorned," but this proverb is really mild, compared to the feelings of Cupid when he realizes that the influence of his love darts are questioned. So Cupid goes after Satan with an insatiable thirst for vengeance.

They meet on the dueling ground, and Cupid, arming himself with Satan's dagger, makes short work of the King of Evil. Then he escorts the lovers home again. They live happily forever afterward, under the careful guidance of Love.

NESTOR.

THOSE JERSEY COWPUNCHERS (Oct. 4).—The Billiken Moving Picture concern has decided to make a special feature of Western subjects. In order to get the proper environment, horses, cowboys and Indians, the director and his company were soon on their way to the glorious West.

Here, however, not a cowboy nor an Indian was to be had—they had all gone to join the moving pictures. The distracted director hurriedly dispatched an order to his studio to send on their "Jersey Cowpunchers" at once.

At last they arrived. The next morning, greatly to the amusement of the old ranch owners, the director soon had them transformed into dare-devil cowboys, and bloodthirsty Indians.

Then followed the rehearsal of the picture, with its many amusing, trying and exciting incidents. So thoroughly did the actors enter into the spirit of the story, that when the actual scenes were taken, the attack by Indians, the wild ride for aid, the firing of the shack and finally the hair-breadth rescue—the bystanders broke into hearty applause—they had been initiated into the making of a Western picture and had found it both entertaining and instructive.

MUTT AND JEFF SPEND A QUIET DAY IN THE COUNTRY (Oct. 7).—Something is decidedly wrong with Mutt. He has not the slightest desire for food, and Jeff's most solicitous efforts are unavailing to stimulate his friend's appetite. Jeff finally decides that a fishing expedition is a consummation devoutly to be wished. Acting on his suggestion, the two colleagues get busy securing tackles, lines, bait and other necessary fishing paraphernalia. How they secure this outfit is a caution; what the outfit looks like is a scream. Suffices to say that the long and the short of it migrate to the country, select a nice, shady nook close to a babbling brook, and start their fishing operations.

Mischief is brewing. Two convicts, tired of grafting on the State, bid adieu to the large establishment in which they had roamed for years, and make for the open country. They come upon Mutt and Jeff and, as might is right, they swap the striped garments for the fishermen's garb. Escaped convicts dash away, with Mutt and Jeff pursuing—at a safe distance. The prison guards? Oh, yes; they are coming!

The lynx-eyed runaways repair to a friendly barn, while Mutt and Jeff are flagged by some inviting clothes swinging to and fro from a line. The lady of the house, or rather the owner of the clothes gently swaying in the breeze, creates such a commotion as to bring on the guards. Realizing that Mutt and Jeff are not the birds they are hunting for, they send our heroes into the barn to remove the stripes.

There's something doing in that barn, and the guards, fearing the two friends are murdering one another, rush in upon them and come out with the escaped convicts and the striped garments.

MOTION picture weather is now here. That means a rush of business. Since the film exchanges have abandoned their slide departments, the important question to the exhibitor right now is, can the smaller slide exchanges cope with the rush of orders, and keep everyone satisfied?

Do not waste your valuable time experimenting, but place your order with an old, reliable firm that has had 6 years of experience, and get in on the ground floor.

We do not give song slides away, but our rental rate does insure you everything that represents an excellent slide service.

Remember, you have a more critical public to contend with now than you had in previous years. They have learned the difference between junk slides and new ones, therefore their satisfaction means money to you, and money to you means that no slide service can be any too good for you.

Write for our immense catalogue and rates and other particulars.

Mutt, looking somewhat like his famous ancestor, Adam, arrayed in a barrel, goes on a still hunt for some apparel, to cover up the primitive appearance of his companion, Jeff. A voluminous nightgown meets his gaze; he captures it and throws it into the barn, whence Jeff soon emerges enveloped in the capacious folds of the nightie.

THE MEDDLING PARSON (Oct. 7).—The Bachelor Club had announced a poker tournament. The cleverest player to receive a gold cup, and as a result the four chums repaired to Smith's for practice, each player bent upon winning the first prize.

Here, being unable to find the poker chips, the men pooled enough money to go around, intending it to be returned as soon as the game was finished.

This, however, Smith's uncle, the parson, absolutely refused to believe. But it was not until his old friend, John Kirby, captain of police, called upon him, that the Parson conceived the idea of teaching the young men a good lesson. Smilingly the captain fell in with his plan, and at once sent officer Casey a note advising him to raid the Smith home that night, as a joke. But unfortunately for their little joke, the letter dropped from Casey's pocket and was picked up by Slippery Sam.

Hurrying to his attic, the crook quickly donned a policeman's uniform and made a flying call upon the players, commanding them to place their money in a bag.

No sooner had Sam reached his room than the boys' cheerfulness in performing this trifling service for him was plain. The bag contained only stage money, used by the party that night, because the chips were misplaced.

The Parson, much to the amusement of the boys, was explaining that he had caused the raid when officer Casey appears, and believing that the old gentleman had made him the target for a practical joke, he seized the Parson by the collar and hustled him off to the police station.

YANKEE.

HIS SECOND WIFE (Oct. 9).—A young actor playwright and his wife are living in a furnished room. The wife rebels at the condition of affairs. After a quarrel she goes away with another man. The young husband is downcast at this; but he continues to peddle his play.

Scene from "His Second Wife" (Yankee).

He takes up his quarters at a boarding house and becomes acquainted with a stenographer, who soon falls in love with him. The man finally gets a manager to read over the play, but while awaiting a decision he is suddenly taken sick. Alone and helpless, he is thankful for the help of the stenographer, who proves a faithful nurse.

He receives word that his play has been accepted and recovers in time to see it produced. After the success of the play he leaves the boarding house and apparently forgets all about the stenographer. She reads of his divorce and of his wonderful success as a playwright. When he again meets the girl he begins to realize the strength of her love. He proposes and is accepted. The man, now a popular playwright, spends most of his time at the club. He neglects his wife, but at the same time he is kind and considerate to her.

The wife begins to realize that her husband does not have the love for her that she craves for. He is called away to witness the production of one of his new plays and while at the hotel he receives a telegram which informs him of an addition to his family.

The first realization of what his wife has gone through comes over him. He hastens back home as quickly as possible and the sight of his wife and baby awakens the man to his sense of duty. The man's attitude toward his wife changes. The first wife sees her former husband and follows him to his home. Through the window she sees him happy and contented with his second wife and baby.

SOCIETY HOBOES (Oct. 13).—A tramp coming upon a jolly garden party in a millionaire colony, is called a wretched beggar by one of the men, who appears to be the leader of the gathering. In resenting this accusation, he asks the gentlemen present how many of them could make their own way through the country without a penny in their pockets as he has done. This leads to a discussion and eventually the men of the party in evening dress and high hats decide upon trying a hobo's life for a little while, having been goaded into doing so by the words of the hobo and the derision of their wives.

They jump into a freight car and are locked in. In total darkness and amid dusty surroundings they fall asleep and lose track of time. When the car is opened, they jump out, a disheveled quartet of what was once, natty-appearing society men. While they are deciding where they can possibly be, the freight pulls out, leaving them lost in what appears to them a strange land. They are held up by a trio of genuine tramps, who compel them to change clothes. They are driven away by farmers, whom they ask for help; frightened almost to death by several Indians from a Wild West show; chased time and again by farmers and boys, until footsore and weary, unable to go another step, they lie down to rest and are arrested as common tramps.

Proving their identity in the police court, they are given their freedom. In trying to enter their own homes they are shot at by their wives and driven forth into the grounds. Eventually they enter their own homes and vow "NEVER AGAIN."

LARGE LAKES OF ITALY (Oct. 10).—The large lakes of Italy are alone in their glory. They possess an atmosphere that is not to be found about any other of the world's famous lakes. Lake Maggiore is the pride of all Italians, and is here shown in all its beauty. Some excellent views are had of the Borromees Islands and numerous character studies of native boatmen in their queer craft.

THOU SHALT NOT STEAL (Oct. 10).—A parson is changing his place of abode. As the movers are carrying out his effects he is extremely solicitous about a trunk which he tells them contains his "treasures." This arouses the curiosity of the two movers, who show a desire to know what is inside. There is no chance to do this because the parson insists on following the moving van. Finally the two movers induce the minister to rest himself by driving while they guard the back. As soon as the parson is in the driver's seat the movers untie the trunk and depart.

Their mishaps with the trunk are funny. They run into a sleeping policeman, other obstacles. A sneak thief is being pursued by a mob and the two movers take refuge in a cellar until the excitement subsides, but unluckily the fugitive dives into the same cellar. All three are hauled out by the police and the sneak thief is taken to jail. The two movers continue with their heavy burden until they come to a barn. They boost the trunk upstairs into the hay loft, where they ransack it at leisure. They keep throwing out sermons, sermons, and again sermons. The last thing they come to is a sermon on "Thou shalt not steal." Those were the "treasures."

RUNNING FAWN'S CHIEF (Oct. 14).—A half breed gambler playing cards with the cowboys before a general store is exposed by Big Moose, an Indian brave. The half-breed attacks the Indian, but the white men stop the duel and give the crooked gambler until sundown to get out of the camp. Big Moose is adored by Running Fawn, an Indian maid, and after the quarrel they wend their way through the forest to their tribal home.

The half-breed, smarting under his disgrace, lays in wait and shoots Big Moose and in turn is promptly shot by Running Fawn. Mounting the gambler's horse she gallops back to the general store for aid. Meanwhile the two men, badly wounded though they are, renew the duel, able only to crawl about upon the ground. Running Fawn returns with the cowboys just as the half-breed is about to plunge his knife into the helpless Indian. A well directed shot makes an end of him and Big Moose is taken back to the camp. He is nursed back to health and strength by Running Fawn and when he is well they are married by a sky pilot and Big Moose becomes Running Fawn's Chief.

GREAT NORTHERN.

THE WHITE TULIP (Oct. 7).—Two men, wishing to play a joke on a companion, insert an advertisement in the papers, saying that a wealthy bachelor desires to make the acquaintance of a young lady with a view to matrimony, applicants to call at a certain restaurant, wearing a white tulip, where they will find the prospective bridegroom; the confederates, knowing that the object of their joke frequents this place. The advertisement has a magical effect on all matrimonial inclined who read it, and forthwith each one begins to make excuses to get away from her respective employment. Sales ladies, stenographers, and even domestic servants of all ages, are suddenly afflicted with aches and pains in order to relinquish work and keep the appointment. Within the restaurant we see the two men with their victim. Taking two white tulips from the centerpiece on the table, they place one in each lapel of his coat and then bid him good-by, and wait outside to watch the trend of events. Soon the would-be brides arrive and the victim gets a hot time. The state of affairs becomes unbearable, and the police are summoned, and five taxi-cab loads of fair damsels and one Adonis are carted off to the magistrate. Here confusion soon reigns supreme, but explanations eventually follow, and after "mere man" has been reduced to an almost irreparable wreck at the hands of the infuriated damsels, the curtain drops.

Barcelona (Oct. 7).—A travel film of extreme beauty, showing the interesting and picturesque life in this pretty European city.

CHAMPION.

WHAT THE INDIANS DID (Oct. 11).—Redway receives a visit from Weatherby and the latter's daughter, Alice. Redway and Bailey, the foreman, both fall in love with her. Weatherby, needing money, tells his circumstances to Redway, who offers aid. Weatherby suggests in return an alliance between his old friend and Alice, which is agreed to. Alice is induced to accept Redway.

A treacherous half-breed overhears the plan to transport the money to the ranch, and leaves to incite the men of his tribe to waylay the party. On his way to camp he steals a bundle of cavalry uniforms from an army post supply wagon. These he uses as disguises, and his party of Indians, wearing the coats and hats of U. S. Cavalrymen, get close to the Redway party before being recognized.

A fierce battle ensues. Meanwhile, Bailey, the foreman, with other cowboys, meets the supply wagon and recognizes the half-breed from the driver's description. They ride to the Indian camp to arrest him. There they discover the discarded war-bonnets of the Indians and an old hat, once worn by the half-breed. Tom Bailey suspects the situation, and gathering up the war-bonnets for their disguise, the cowboys are away.

In this way they manage to descend on the attacking Indians, and catch them between two fires. The half-breed is attacked by Tom as he is about to kill Redway. Tom is wounded, but the rescue is accomplished. At the ranch again, Redway, who owes his life to Tom, observes a little love scene between him and Alice, and decides that the girl is not for him, but for his brave young employé.

THE NATIONAL GUARD ENCAMPMENT AT FORT RILEY (Oct. 9).—The Champion Co. presents a most powerful object lesson in the delineation of military camp life at Pawnee Flats, on the Government reservation, Fort Riley, Kansas. At this encampment, the United States Government furnishes large bodies of regular troops to intermingle with the militia, thus affording them practical lessons in the duties of regular soldiery.

No wonder then that we see in our various State Militia organizations a body of men of whom the country may feel justly proud. The Fort Riley maneuvers are therefore worthy of the highest consideration of every American.

Some of the evolutions of the soldiers are executed with a brilliancy that is startling to behold, while the general drilling and marching of the men must excite the admiration of every feminine breast. Every form of military work is gone through, from the opening to the breaking of camp. The erecting of the tents alone is well worth our intelligent reflection and thought. Company B of the 1st Regiment of Kansas, holds the record in conical tent erection, putting up their tent in the record-breaking time of two minutes and thirty-eight seconds.

LOST ILLUSIONS (Oct. 5).—Grace, a girl of the mountains, meets a young artist from the East in the woods. It happens. What to the polished, blase artist is only a flirtation, becomes for the simple mountain girl, a lasting, vital love. He is the man of her dreams. The artist returns to the East, completely forgetting the remembering girl.

The girl suffers. Her father dies. She is all alone in a lonely world. She consents to marry Bill, her mountain lover, if he sells her claim and takes her East. Bill accepts the compromise, and they arrive at a fashionable hotel in the city. And in the corridor of the hotel she meets—the artist! She goes to him; the latent love is reborn, surges through her being. She introduces her husband, and asks him to permit the artist to paint her portrait. Reluctantly, he consents.

The next day, when her husband calls for her at the studio, he enters just in time to see her sway toward the artist, lips ready to meet his, eyes staring into the soul of a man and sin. Broken-hearted, he returns to his room, writes out a check for all the money he possesses, and leaves the woman and the city, to return to the sneers and jeers of his mountaineer friends.

The next day the artist introduces to Grace—his wife and child! The fog lifts, the blackness and bleakness disappear, and the woman takes the narrow path back to the everlasting hills and happiness.

LUX.

BILL HAS A BATH (Oct. 6).—This film shows Bill setting out to meet his girl, and having a wet time en route. His first experience is while passing a house which is being painted. While staring up and watching the men at work, he is suddenly showered with the contents of several cans of paint, which are accidentally upset by one of the workmen. A few feet on, we see him watching a street cleaner sprinkling the street, when, all at once, the hose burst, and poor Bill has another bath.

NEIGHBORS (Oct. 6).—A comedy showing how a bad tempered old woman hater and a crusty old maid were led to the altar after a series of fierce conflicts and unneighborly squabbles, by the friendship of their pet dogs. Laughable incidents, good acting and sagacious animals, together with good quality, should make the film a winner.

ECLAIR.

BETTER TO HAVE REMAINED BLIND (Oct. 9).—Helen, while dressing, met with an accident. Her eyes are burnt by an alcohol lamp. Her husband does all that he can to make her life happy, and the young woman seems to forget that she is blind. But her husband falls in love with a friend of hers. Meanwhile Helen is following her doctor's advice and without telling her husband, she undergoes an operation and—she can see again. Full of happiness she comes home, enters the drawing-room and finds her husband at the feet of a woman. The two lovers get up, taken aback. Jack thinks she can't see and he is himself again, but before the sad looking of his wife, he understands and the two guilty ones ask forgiveness. But it was too much for Helen's heart—she falls down, dead.

THE MOTOR CHAIR (Oct. 9).—After many years of work, John has invented a marvelous motor chair. His mother-in-law is charmed with it and while she is alone sits down in the motor chair. Suddenly the motor chair becomes animated, rushes through the room, walls, towns and country. It is useless to try to stop it. And still, a mere child touches the mechanism and the chair stops, then goes off very easy carrying the child, which is very happy.

AMERICAN.

THE LOVE OF THE WEST (Oct. 2).—Jack Whitcomb, who has been out West for some time making his fortune, receives a letter from his sweetheart in the city, saying that she will soon join him. The day for her arrival has come and Jack goes to meet her. He escorts his sweetheart to his home and introduces her to his mother and his friends. Everything is made beautiful for her, and she expresses a feeling of happiness.

A week later Alice begins to show signs of homesickness. This is more exemplified when she receives a letter from her girl chum, saying that she is having a good time going to balls, parties, etc. This message makes her long for the city and its wonderful sights more so, and when Jack tells her that he likes the West much better than the city, and implores her to stay, she answers: "I want the city." After she has gone, Jack kisses his mother and goes out on the porch to be left alone with his thoughts.

THE MINER'S WIFE (Oct. 5).—Bill Moore, an undesirable character, is driven from Circle A Ranch. He wanders to the hut of Jim Newton, a miner, who is very hospitable and invites him to stay.

When Jim is at work the next day, Bill assaults the miner's wife, and when her mother intercedes, she is knocked unconscious. During her state of unconsciousness Bill writes a note to Jim, saying that he thanks him for his kindness and for the girl, and then runs away with her. Soon after their departure, Jim's mother-in-law regains consciousness, sees the note, and at once dashes away to the mine and informs Jim of the dastardly trick.

Jim, with a number of ranchmen, follow the trail and soon discover the villain hiding in a hut in the canyon. They open fire on him, but the villain having the advantage over the approaching ranchmen, kills quite a number of them. In the meantime, Jim's wife, who had been bound, succeeded in releasing herself, and rushing to the kidnapper pushes him out into the open to receive a fusillade of bullets from the ranchmen. He is mortally wounded, and Jim and his wife are soon in each other's arms.

THE LAND THIEVES (Oct. 9).—George Wilson is an emigrant seeking a new home. He stops at the town for provisions, and is warned by the rangers to look out for the land thieves. His daughter leaves the "prairie schooner" and her father introduces her to Jim Haden, the leader of the rangers. The ranger is very much impressed with the homesteader's daughter, and she is pleased with the manly ranger.

Their business transactions completed, the homesteaders continue their journey across the plains. The wagon is observed by the land thieves, who send a spy to find out where the "nester" intends to locate. At last, in a fertile valley George Wilson starts to stake out his new home, and the spy returns to tell the other land thieves the place selected.

The land thieves ride en masse to the homesteader's camp and warn him to leave the range before sundown. After their departure, the frightened wife and daughter urge the homesteader to leave, but he refuses to surrender his rights at the mandate of the outlaws.

Securing his horse, he rides out to inspect the surrounding country. The leader of the land thieves, watching him from ambush, fires at him, killing him instantly.

When her father does not return to camp, Margaret becomes uneasy, and mounting one of the horses, she goes out to look for him. She comes upon his body, and kneeling beside it gives way to her grief, when she hears the land thieves approaching. Securing her father's gun, she rides for her life, followed by the desperadoes. When she arrives in camp she gives her mother a gun and the two women prepare to defend themselves against the onslaught of the land thieves.

In the meantime Jim Haden, the ranger, has received a note from headquarters warning him that land thieves are raiding the reservation. He calls the boys together and they ride out to investigate. In the distance they see the unequal battle waged by the desperadoes against the helpless women. They hurry to the rescue, arriving just in time to save them from capture and insult at the hands of the outlaws. The overwrought girl faints in Jim's arms, and it is evident that the interest awakened in his heart for her will be a lasting one.

SOLAX.

A BREEZY MORNING (Oct. 4).—Mr. Jones is expecting Mrs. Jones home from the country, so he is up early, and dressed only in his nightshirt he goes to the hall for the morning paper. A gust of wind slams his door shut, leaving him in an embarrassing position. Hearing voices in the hall and finding the door of another apartment open he rushes in and closes the door. Two girls come upstairs and finding their door shut, one of them, who is dressed in a kimona, goes for the janitor, leaving her sister sitting on the steps. She meets Jones' son and explains her plight to him, who suggests that she come in his apartment until he can get her door unlocked. He then goes up the fire-escape to get in her window and thus opens the door. Mr. Jones, senior, sees a figure silhouetted against the window, and thinking it is a burglar, hurriedly puts on some female lingerie and rushes into the hall. Mrs. Jones, coming up the stairs, sees the queer-looking object and faints. Jones grabs her key and rushes to his apartment, where he witnesses another fainting. He gets in bed and feigns sleep. Both ladies are revived and Jones is found sleeping peacefully, but is found guilty when his neighbor discovers a bit of her lingerie sticking out from between the mattresses.

HIS SISTER'S SWEETHEART (Oct. 6).—Scene opens with the arrival of troops from maneuvers at Captain Bell's house, at Fort Graham. Bell's sister, Edith, and her friend, Agnes, welcome them. Bell is introduced to Agnes and falls in love with her. Agnes has a brother, George, who is in love with Bell's sister, Edith. George wants an officer's commission. He cautions the girls not to tell Captain Bell that he is Agnes' brother.

That evening Bell continues to make love to Agnes. George, who is on picket duty, becomes lonely and sends a note to his sweetheart, Edith, to come down to his post to have a chat. Edith goes, and George, lost in love, lays down his gun and they stroll to a quiet nook.

Meantime Captain Bell, who is enjoying a stroll around the grounds with Agnes, is astonished to find that George is not on duty at his post. He searches and finds George and has him arrested.

All ends well, however, when the Captain discovers that George is no other than his sister's sweetheart.

ANNOUNCEMENT No. 9

QUALITY is the dominant factor of every great modern enterprise. Without QUALITY we should never have attempted the greatest movement ever conceived in the MOVING PICTURE INDUSTRY.

So, too, conviction is the greatest asset of the human mind. In conviction's name more successful issues have been fought out than the unreflecting can conceive; it was that peculiar mental condition (CONVICTION) which led us in the market with the EXCLUSIVE IDEA.

We honestly feel that every exhibitor will, on reflection, become a convert to the idea, in other words, the trend of the whole industry is in that direction, and that the advent of the NATIONAL marks the transformation of the industry and that we are the leaders of the MOVEMENT.

We are firm in the conviction that no picture house is so strong, but that we can benefit it with the quality represented in our 21-Reel Programme.

Some particular QUALITY accounts for a Nation's greatness; these qualities are the dominating elements in the films of all nations represented in our programme.

It is our CONVICTION, and we believe it is your CONVICTION, that QUALITY in this business, ceases to carry conviction the moment it neglects variety, and that in choosing from the world's best, as does the NATIONAL, we are putting before the public the greatness of all nations as reflected by its literary and dramatic life, and by so doing we are conserving the highest principle of the business, QUALITY, COUPLED WITH VARIETY.

EXCLUSIVE FILM SERVICE EVERY

When You Show National Programme in Your Theatre No Apologies.

WE are now preparing and mailing letters to the different exhibitors in the allotted territories, informing them where they can secure a National Service for your patrons.

ALWAYS read any literature with the word "NATIONAL" because it is of interest to you.

WANTED—Every exhibitor in the United States or North America to send us the name who wants National Service in his house.

THE REASON WHY

Because our obligation to you is to see that you are served with the best.

Special: A National Gazette on Sunday.
A Wednesday's Educational, every week.

THE THANHOUSER WO-A-WEEK

The Early Life of David Copperfield

First of the Series from the Novel
By CHARLES DICKENS

Released Tuesday, October 17th

The people who most affect the early life of David Copperfield are his mother, Mr. Murdstone, Peggotty, Ham, Little Em'ly, Uncle Dan, Mr. Creakle, Steerforth and Aunt Betsey.

All exert their influence either for good or evil. The associations and environments of his younger days indelibly stamp upon David's character strongly defined traits.

David and his early associates are reproduced amidst a Dickensonian atmosphere, with remarkable fidelity to the great novel. All the most dramatic and picturesque incidents of this period of his life are shown. The critics all agree that this production is a "revelation."

The Satyr and The Lady

Released Friday, October 20th

An artist's model of the usual type, poses with a shoe-string pedlar for a painting which the artist calls "The Satyr and the Lady." In the eyes of the peddler, the beautiful model is the embodiment of all that is virtuous and noble.

On his deathbed he writes to "The Lady," asking her to take care of his orphan daughter. The assumption of this responsibility completely regenerates the one-time careless model and also wins her a good husband.

Little Em'ly and David Copperfield

ITALIAN BLOOD

An Illustration of What Might Have Been the Result of Indifference

In the little Italian home the wife feels she is neglected and apparently it seems that her husband's love is growing cold, for he has become decidedly indifferent. She, therefore, plans with her cousin to arouse his love through jealousy. At an Italian picnic, after repeated vain efforts to draw her husband's attentions toward her, she starts off with her cousin, passing in view of her husband. His fiery nature is violently aroused with jealousy, and rushing home in a towering rage would have wreaked disaster to the entire family, for his terrible suspicion poisons his mind even against his two little children. He learns the truth, however, and realizes now to what extreme the result of his neglect would have driven him.

RELEASED OCTOBER 12th, 1911

Trailing the Counterfeiter

This is another big mystery, on which the two famous Biograph Sherlocks go to work. These two sleuths, as before, nearly catch the criminal. When they read in the newspapers of the mystery, they set out to solve it. They, of course, trail the wrong man, while real detectives run down the right one, and also arrest the sleuths for butting in. The police captain, however, lets them go, but later, when they, thinking they have discovered the crook's hiding place, blow in the wall of the police station, they are cooped up.

Approximate Length 520 feet.

JOSH'S SUICIDE

Josh doesn't like the way things go at home and decides to quit and get out. Later, his wife gets what purports to be his farewell letter, which is intended to lead her to believe he has committed suicide. He, however, goes to New York to have a good time, and he does "by gosh." The wife, believing herself a widow, makes a trip to New York with her admirer. Well, you may guess the rest. During the course of this little comedy many attractive New York scenes are shown.

THE WILLOUGHBY AMUSEMENTS COMPANY

To Clement Mason, Esq.,

Clement-Mason Cinematograph Co., Ltd., Sydney, Australia.

Dear Sir: It affords me extreme pleasure to inform you of the high regard I hold for your latest importation, namely THE MOTIOGRAPH. I have operated with all the latest Cinematograph Machines and have come to the conclusion that your MOTIOGRAPH is the essence of that perfection which we operators have long desired. For perfect mechanism, simplicity of action, fireproof qualities, portability, price, and an absolutely flickerless picture I at present fail to see how this machine can be improved upon.

I sincerely trust that this true expression of my faith in THE MOTIOGRAPH may lead to its adoption throughout the Moving Picture World.

Wishing you every success which you richly deserve, I am,

Yours faithfully,
Fred Smyth.

Facts and Comments

WE deem it a duty to register a protest against the pornographic character of altogether too many of the "popular" songs, that are thrust on the market these days and that naturally tempt slide makers into wrong channels. The assumption that the public wants such songs, is not founded on anything stronger than the pornographic instincts of the producer of the songs. It seems a pity, that between such stupid efforts as "I am looking for a nice young fellow, who is looking for a nice young girl" and recent suggestive and indecent compositions, which we are barred from naming, for fear of soiling these pages, the production of songs has degenerated into a distinct agency of evil. There may be rowdies and degenerates, who delight in this sort of thing, but to every normal human being it is like an emetic and to the fathers of young daughters, who accidentally and unsuspectingly wander into a place where such songs are sung, a grievous scandal and mortification. The slide makers should make a stand against such salacious and vulgar songs.

If we must have the illustrated song, let us have something that looks like the product of an intelligent and decent human being. It is not always possible to find and command talent for the composition of popular songs, but it is always possible and always necessary to keep these affairs within the limits of decency. Nothing is more disgusting, than an Anglo-Saxon effort at the "double entendre," at glossing filth and impurity and smothering a risque joke in a mass of cunning words. The Latin races have a more or less unenviable talent for such things. The Englishman or American trying to imitate this slippery grace never succeeds beyond being vulgar. The exhibitor, who allows a succession of choruses of questionable songs to form part of his evening's program is making a grave mistake on his own account and injuring the industry at large. In other parts of this country, we mean outside of New York City, such things would not be tolerated by the audiences. It would be well for composers and slide makers to bear in mind that this city is only a very small part of the country and outside of New York it is an axiom in the amusement business that decency pays. A censorship of "popular songs" seems far more necessary than a censorship of pictures.

IN last week's issue THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD told a deeply interesting and most significant story. It appears, that after the manner of their kind, certain theatrical managers pitchforked a so-called musical comedy into a Southern city, where people of refinement and intelligence have long made their home. The theater, where this attempt to foist indecent "comedy" upon the people was made, is accounted the largest in the city. The company carried no orchestra and as the best musicians were all in the employ of the moving picture houses there was no orchestra. The production, as might have been expected, proved a woeful failure.

The significant feature of the situation, and one, which must please every true friend of the moving picture, was the way in which the press of the city sang the praises of the picture and instituted comparisons between the "legitimate" attraction of doubtful value and the moving picture. All were full of appreciation of the clean and wholesome character of the pictures. Indeed it may well be contended, that the picture was responsible for the creation of a discriminating public taste, which utterly rejected such a prurient piece of stage work as "The Girl from Rector's." The defeat of such a play is a distinct victory for the photoplay. The case is typical. Everywhere patrons of amusements have become more critical and exacting through habitual attendance at decent moving picture entertainments. THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD has always and unswervingly fought for a policy of clean, wholesome pictures and for a becoming respect of public opinion. To see our policy bear fruit in such a way and work out practically as well as theoretically must be a source of just gratification to every true and honest friend of the moving picture.

REPORTS from France are to the effect, that Sarah Bernhardt, the greatest actress of the age, if not of all ages, has at last consented to pose before the moving picture camera. There is a lack of further detail, we do not know, in what parts she will appear and when the final arrangements will be completed. While waiting for more definite information on the subject, it is well to state, that the appearance of this marvelously gifted woman before the camera will bring the glories and lessons of her art home to many millions, who would otherwise have been deprived of that pleasure and benefit. It is to be hoped that some reels at least will be preserved for future generations, for a histrionic genius of the type of Sarah Bernhardt may not shine again on the theatrical firmament for many years to come. Siddons and Ristori and all their art and their gifts died with them, but thanks to the moving picture, it may in future well be said, of great actors and actresses that not only their spirit, but its embodiment will live after them.

THE bias of historians is one of the misfortunes of civilization. What English historian may be acquitted of prejudice? Even the admirable Hallam was but human and his impartiality has almost passed into a literary proverb. Not inaptly some critic has called the scintillating Macaulay's work "a huge Whig pamphlet." American history has suffered to even a greater extent from bias and prejudice of historians. The cinematograph is utterly without bias and prejudice and purports to be nothing more than a recorder. We could afford in exchange for twenty thousand feet of moving pictures, showing the life and events of the Elizabethan period, to throw all the historians of that period, from Froude down, into the waste-basket of time. As a vindicator of truth and facts the moving picture, showing history, is without an equal. A little while ago a somewhat acrimonious controversy raged in G. A. R. circles and in the magazines as to the responsibility of the crushing Union defeat at Chancellorsville. Such controversies lose nothing in bitterness, because the battles, which form the subjects of them, have been fought in the long ago. Even Waterloo is fought over in type about every ten years. A few reels of pictures taken on or near the spot would make such quarrels impossible in the future.

A NEWS dispatch from a town in New Jersey tells the story of a lad who stole his employer's money and ran away. Of course he had been induced to commit the crime by the bad moving picture, and it is about time that the authorities, etc., etc. Not at all, my dear reforming enthusiast, not at all; in fact nothing of the kind, and indeed just the contrary. Why this boy with the unlawful loot in his pocket saw a good, clean moral picture, showing that boys are sure to get the worst of it and that honesty is the only correct policy. The picture so worked on his mind that he went back to his employer, made partial restitution and registered a vow to be hereafter a good man and observe the laws of God and men. With lawyers stung into righteousness by the sight of a realistic picture of Hell, and bad boys turned into the path of honesty the vulgar estimate of the picture as a crime breeder will have to be thoroughly revised.

New Aspects of the Moving Picture.

By W. Stephen Bush.

THE worn-out newspaper phrase, "Moving pictures corrupt the morals of the young," bids fair to give way to another stereotyped expression: "The possibilities of the moving picture." It is a phrase of much gentler import, and shows an effort, however vague and groping, to express the change in the attitude of the general public toward the moving picture. It is too early to expect an intelligent and painstaking appreciation of the picture in the daily press; editors and reporters seem as yet unable to go one inch below the surface of things. Nevertheless it is a good sign and argues well for juster journalistic treatment of this great invention. The recent attempt to coin human misfortune into dollars through moving pictures, happily unsuccessful, brought from many a newspaper an open or implied acknowledgment of the progress of the picture.

The power and intensity of the moving picture, its direct, yet subtle and lasting influence on mind and memory, have often been dwelt upon in these columns and make discussion as to the importance of the picture in the field of morals timely and appropriate.

In promoting feelings of toleration, compassion and humanitarian sentiments generally, the picture has long ago rendered and is constantly rendering services to mankind. It is able to foster and develop such sentiments because it sharpens, quickens and intensifies what W. E. H. Lecky in his "History of the Morals of Europe" has so happily designated as the "REALIZING FACULTY." That profound and sympathetic judge of human nature knew nothing of moving pictures, yet nothing ever penned has a more forceful meaning, when applied to the picture, than the lines that we now venture to quote from the book mentioned. Says the author: ". . . The power of realization forms the chief tie between our moral and intellectual natures. In order to pity suffering, we must realize it and the intensity of our compassion is usually proportioned to the vividness of our realization."

Perhaps an illustration, made for the purposes of comparison will make this point perfectly clear. Let us assume that a great catastrophe has overtaken a certain portion of the world; to be more specific let us say we are dealing with the fearful earthquake that not long ago laid waste the fairest parts of Italy. The reported destruction of life, the misery inflicted on unhappy survivors, the loss of property, will make far less impression on us than the death of a single individual, if this individual was our neighbor and we saw him in the flesh every day and were constant witnesses of his affairs. Our realizing faculty is only slightly and superficially touched in one instance and deeply stirred in the other. It all depends on the vividness of our impressions. In other words, what is immediately present and visible to us, most strongly moves our realizing faculty and influences our will.

Again, take two men, who make an appeal to the charity of an audience for the sufferers through some great natural calamity. One uses words, either spoken or printed, the other produces pictures of the calamity taken on the spot. Which of the two will appeal more effectually to our realizing faculty and through that to our hearts?

We will quote once more the words of Lecky, so eminently true of the moving picture. He writes: "If our benevolent feelings are thus the slaves of our imagination, if an act of realization is a necessary antecedent and condition of compassion, it is obvious that any influence that augments the range and power of this realizing faculty is favorable to the amiable virtues (or humanitarian feelings)."

Mark the words, "Any influence that augments the range and power of the realizing faculty." Of what influence is this truer, to what influence is it more applicable than the influence of the moving picture? Instinctively or intuitively one company of American filmmakers at least has fitted its pictures to this philosophy of moving the "amiable virtues" and increasing humanitarian sentiments, feelings of pity, of compassion and toleration. We could this moment name scores and scores of Biograph pictures which owe their success and popularity to the clever appeal they make to the realizing faculty.

Go to a moving picture entertainment in neighborhoods where the struggle for daily bread makes a judicious feeding of the mind and heart an exceedingly difficult problem, or take a moving picture house in the remoter rural communities, and the slightest effort at observation will convince you that the moving picture accomplishes an educational or rather ethical work of no mean value and proportion. "To an uneducated man," says Lecky, "all classes, modes of thought and existence, foreign to his own, are unrealized, while every increase of knowledge brings with it an increase of insight and therefore of sympathy. But the addition to his knowledge is the smallest part of this change. The realizing faculty is itself intensified. Every book he reads accustoms him to rise above the objects immediately present to his senses, to extend his realization into new spheres and produce in his imagination the thoughts, feelings and characters of others."

May we not say the same in a much higher degree of "every picture he sees?" The picture produces and preserves impressions with a vividness inconceivable to the reader of a mere book.

Half a dozen people were looking at the filming of a story with which they were familiar. They had read and re-read the book dozens of times and felt quite confident that they had exhausted its stock of thoughts and sensations. They soon found cause to amend their views as the pictures gave body and actuality to that which they had up to that time only seen in the haze of their own imaginations. Their realizing faculty awoke with a start and was soon kept busy absorbing new impressions, new thoughts and new sensations.

But recently the moving picture has taken a hold on the peoples of the Far East, a large percentage of them savages or semi-barbarians. The Chinese, the Hindoos, the many tribes, that people the islands of Asiatic waters have, according to most reliable and authentic reports, been attracted to the moving picture as a teacher, and much may justly be expected for the civilization of these nations through the picture. Here again the words of Lecky are so apt and striking that they deserve quotation: ". . . The transition of men from a barbarous or semi-civilized to a highly organized state brings with it . . . the introduction of refined and intellectual tastes . . . the rapid multiplication of ties of connection between all classes and nations. . . ."

In our own country the picture ought to attest and approve its value as an ethical teacher in the combating and removing of prejudices of all kinds. A promotion of brotherly feeling and mutual tolerance is surely no visionary object. Hundreds, we may say thousands, of pictures have a salutary effect in these directions, more thorough, salutary and lasting than theater, school or church could hope to produce. Toleration is a pronounced affirmative tendency of the age and has such apostles as Emerson, Browning and Maeterlinck. It is strongly represented on the stage, and there is every reason to believe that the moving picture is destined to play no small part in the spread of this practical and most useful sentiment, in so many instances the basis and condition of philanthropic achievement and intellectual progress.

An Antidote to Panics.

AN article in a recent issue of "The Western Electrician" is well worth reprinting. It refers to the crass ignorance of the general public in most things electrical. We believe it ought to be circulated by the exhibitors among their patrons, for little aid is to be expected in enlightening the public in such matters, as far as the daily press is concerned. Here is the article in full.

"While reason can hardly be said to hold sway in time of a panic, and though the crowd unthinkingly rushes out of a theater at a cry of "Fire" following the blowing out of a fuse, it does seem that a little wider and surer knowledge of electrical matters would decrease the loss of life from such causes. A recent and notable instance is that of the fire scare which occurred last Saturday at Cannonsburg, Pa.

"In that case the cause of the panic was the blowing out of a fuse in the moving picture booth. There was a loss of nearly thirty lives from the resultant panic.

"Had a fair proportion of those present been previously informed by reading or experience as to the nature of such an occurrence, the fire-proof booth construction required by the National Board of Fire Underwriters and the absence of any danger, the panic would no doubt have been averted.

"There seems to be a rather general lack of knowledge about electrical matters by those not directly connected with some branch of the industry. As an example may be cited the fact that a large percentage of the people using the street cars every day are almost without an idea of their mode of operation. It is for this reason that there is very often a near-panic when, as a result of an overcrowded car, a circuit-breaker goes out.

"There is no way absolutely to prevent the frenzied rush of people that follows a flash, but to acquaint them pretty thoroughly with the cause would at least lessen danger. As the number of those familiar with the harmlessness of such a flash and with electricity in general increase, there will be more faith in the safety of modern appliances."

The moral to be drawn from the fire at Cannonsburg is the necessity of making the public acquainted with the electric devices and appliances commonly used in connection with running a moving picture entertainment. Ignorance is the parent of fear and knowledge destroys fear. You cannot expect the public to enlighten itself, but give them a few plain facts that they can easily understand and digest and one of the most fruitful of all causes of panic will have been effectually removed.

Credit Where Credit is Due.

By Epes Winthrop Sargent.

IN discussing a recent article in the Dramatic Mirror, suggesting that the man who developed the author's idea into a real scenario be given joint credit with the author on the film, an old time director advanced another reason as to why a credit line would be useful.

"Of course the idea is to keep down the chance of a director making a reputation with one concern and taking it over to another company," he explained, "but there are so few companies that this does not hold good and the manufacturer would get his money back in another way. If I had my name on the film just "good enough" wouldn't be good at all.

"Now when I make the sort of picture that the old man looks at and merely says 'Huh!' I know that I'm doing enough, because it's useless to expect praise from him, and I have side-stepped blame. But if I had to stand for the stuff under my own name, you can bet I'd break a leg to get the film into the best shape I know how."

The point is of more than passing interest. It cannot be denied that the use of names of photoplayers has not alone attracted a better class of players, but it has given incentive to those who already were established. The players feel that they are working for something more than the money they are paid, and they put in to their work more of that quality that money cannot buy. They are working for reputation and the return that reputation will bring and, while it may mean a slightly increased salary roll, it means a more than compensating improvement in the quality of the film.

It is no more than human for a player to use the greatest endeavor only when the reward is adequate. Miss Florence Turner, for example, has been a consistently earnest and conscientious player ever since she went to the Vitagraph Company to begin her photoplay career. She always has given ample return in work for her compensation, and always has done the best that is in her, but no matter how eager she may have been to do her best, to advance her work and her reputation with the firm, she must find an added incentive in the fact that the public now knows and applauds, not "The Vitagraph Girl," but Florence Turner. Just as the sight of the goal puts new life into the distance runner and enables him to wind up his race in a burst of speed, so does the knowledge that she is to get the praise for good work done spur her to greater effort.

The distance man has run his race for twenty miles, doing the best that is in him, but the spurt that would be a human impossibility at the end of the fifteenth mile comes unconsciously with the sight of home and the run in is made at a rate of speed that may surprise even the runner himself. It is the same way with photoplay. Better work is possible where there is an end in sight.

It is no different in the case of the producer. If he knows that he is required to come up to a certain standard, he does not try to give more than that, but he cannot give the same results that are possible where credit is given, because the incentive is not there; he lacks the mental stimulus of the thought that he will be praised for what is good and damned for poor work. He is fighting under his own flag instead of the trade-mark of the firm, and no matter how anxious he may be to give the best that is in him, there is a better "best" possible only where the fullest incentive exists.

The manufacturer cannot be blamed for wanting to preserve the incognito of player and producer, for the instinct of self-preservation is a natural law and the "star" system invariably creates abuses. Twice in the last twenty years the writer has observed the outworking of this system, first in grand opera and later in vaudeville. Abbey, Schoeffel and Grau raised up a Frankenstein in the creation of stars and a ten-year fight has not yet brought the vaudeville headliners under the complete control of the management. Unless the situation be handled with care, salaries are apt to become exorbitant in the case of favorites, but there is a difference between the use of players' names and the overbooming of some favorite.

The booming of Miss Florence Lawrence by the Imp company, and the counter booming of Miss Turner by the Vitagraph merely anticipated what was certain to occur, for personality is the chief asset of the player, and the favorite makes more money for a management than the man or woman whose technique is superb, but whose personality is cold. Photoplay does not differ from the dramatic stage in this particular and the manager can only avail himself of the advantages derived from the exploitation of personality since the situation has run away from him, but since credit is given the player, why not credit the man whose intelligent direction makes the ensemble perfect?

LETTERS OF AN OLD EXHIBITOR TO A NEW FILM MAKER.

Last Instalment.

Saratoga Springs, 1911.

Dear Old Man: The nights are very cold now and as a result the big fish in the lake are coming close to shore to find their food. This is the ideal time for catching big pickerel and I have about half a dozen lines working all the time. While watching the lines I think of a good many things and as I have not caught a single fish in a whole day you will understand why my remarks may be a trifle peppery here and there.

Let me ask you two questions:

To what extent is the production of moving pictures an art?

To what extent are the claims of cinematography as an art recognized by makers and exhibitors of films?

There are, according to a popular flattering estimate something like 90,000,000 of us in Uncle Sam's domain and all of us, infants in arms alone excepted, rally day after day under the flag of the dollar. We till the soil, work in factory or office from Monday to Saturday night and again from Monday to Saturday, while the years roll round and we become dull creatures of routine. To save us entirely from becoming unsightly curious two-legged machines for earning money we have nothing but the national game, which is dead in winter, such noble sports as prize fighting and horse racing, with an occasional lynching thrown in, the circus and the stage. The yellow press is constantly gaining new fields and the day seems not far distant when Boston and San Francisco will rival New York in the journalistic pandering to the worst instincts of human nature.

We see two encouraging signs on the horizon. One, the progress of the stage in the last quarter of a century and the other the development of the decent and uplifting moving picture.

Some German philosopher, according to a popular magazine, expects art to die in a short time. I can imagine him, long-bearded, long-haired and passionately devoted to metaphysics and delicatessen. He says, that commercialism is even now busy writing the epitaph of art and that the pall bearers will be (metaphorically speaking only) our own noble captains of industry.

That brings us around to the first question propounded above. To what extent is the moving picture an art? The presence of artistic elements cannot be denied even in photography, plain and simple. The imitative instinct, the foundation of every art, is surely present in the moving picture It is not, as some imagine, a pure mechanical device. The mechanical device is only used to perpetuate and reproduce the products of skill and art. Art [illegible] art. The display of true art in any shape affects individuals and nations. National temperament as a mirror [illegible] Italians have for centuries produced great artists and that nation has shown the keenest and quickest appreciation of art, not because the Italian blood is hotter or because the sun is warmer, but because on all sides they are surrounded by magnificent and beautiful manifestations of art. Witness "The Stones of Venice."

If the moving picture will in the days to come have power to develop artistic instincts in our people and to create a desire for and an appreciation of the beautiful it will do a service to the nation, which it is difficult to exaggerate.

Whether such a hope is justifiable will depend largely on the answer to the second query. To what extent are the claims of cinematography as an art recognized by makers and exhibitors of films? One would have to be blind in eye and in heart to not recognize the fact that many of the producers regard cinematography as an art and treat it accordingly and that many more have an [illegible] which they manage to express pretty well on the moving picture.

We derive great hope from the development of the stage. With here and there an actor of great gifts and a playwright of ability the American stage of fifty years ago was crude, ignoble and often borrowed its "art" from the circus. It reflected indeed the condition of the great masses of the people, whose Puritan ignorance seemed to be invincible. In no other country in the world would the late Phineas T. Barnum have become a national celebrity, at whose death the leading journals broke forth into columns of obituary. He, unconsciously, voiced the "artistic sentiments" of the country by measuring the merit of theatrical or semi-theatrical enterprises strictly in dollars and cents. He and the men of his type, not quite extinct to-day, invited the people to see the elephant or hear Jenny Lind, not because the animal was a wonder, or the singer had a marvelous voice, but because it cost so many thousands of dollars to bring the pachyderm to America and it cost so much per week to make the artist warble.

Another hopeful sign for the friends of true art in the future development of the moving picture is the progress we have made in music. True, we still insist on proclaiming the salaries of the distinguished artists, who have given fame to our opera, as an infallible gauge of their artistic ability, but then the habits of a generation are not unlearned in a year. We have fine conservatories to-day in our country and the reproach that we listen well enough to hear a dollar bill drop in a boiler shop, but can hardly tell the difference between the air of Yankee Doodle and a "motif" in "Parsifal" is no longer true.

The Tuscan bard, wandering through "the element obscure" or in plain English [illegible] was asked by one of the spirits: "Lives my friend in the glad world above?" "Lives?" answered the poet with tremendous scorn. "He eats and drinks and puts on clothing."

Living is more than "eating, drinking, and putting on clothing." If it were not, the dressed-up lapdog or the harnessed horse would live as much as we. The love of art and beauty makes us sure that we are better.

P. S.—I have finally landed one of the largest pickerel in Lake Lonely and as a result feel kindly toward the entire world. When I sit down after my terrific struggle to my last dinner at Newman's I will establish a record. O. E.

ALSOP—ECKER.

Mr. John T. Alsop, of Jacksonville, Fla., one of the enthusiastic converts to motion pictures of Mr. F. T. Montgomery, and an officer of the Montgomery Amusement Company, dropped into the office of The Moving Picture World the other day to say good-by before returning to Jacksonville. From a chance word dropped by Mr. Alsop, quickly picked up by the editor, we managed to pry him loose from the interesting information that he came to New York to attend his own wedding. The happy event occurred at Calvary Baptist Church, New York, in the presence of a few friends of the contracting parties, on September 20. The bride was Mrs. Ella G. Ecker, a charming and accomplished woman. While Mr. Alsop is not an old man, he has lived the life of a bachelor for some years and admits that he had doubts of ever being anything else; but he frankly confessed that his last two weeks' experience had convinced him that he had missed half his life, though he was catching up fast. The World extends every good wish possible, including long life and unalloyed happiness, to Mr. and Mrs. Alsop.

Reviews of Notable Films

"ZIGOMAR" (Eclair).

(Three Reels.)

FOR some months past a most sensational and fascinating story, published in serial installments in a leading Parisian journal, had aroused the interest and curiosity, not alone of Paris, but of France. The story came from the pen of Leon Sazie, who has, on occasions, shown flashes of the wit and power of Hugo and Maupassant. Readers of English fiction had little difficulty to detect, even under the distinct French garb of "Zigomar," their old friends Sherlock Holmes and Professor Moriarity. Let it not be inferred, however, that the French version of the Conan Doyle idea yields one jot to the English prototype, either in rapidity of action or fertility of invention. On the contrary, the French elaboration of the idea has attractions which are all its own. It introduces a marvelous variety of scenes in the gay and romantic life of Paris and varies it with a trip into the heart of the Swiss Alps. We do not wonder that the story has been compared to "The Wandering Jew" and "Rocambole." The Eclair Company has now filmed this romance of mystery and crime and has devoted three reels to the subject. If the book was thrilling and absorbing, the reels are very much more so. With some reservations, hereafter to be made, this production is a masterpiece of the art which prefers for its special field the world of to-day and seeks to hold the mirror up to modern life. In point of acting, settings and attention to detail, no film production is worthy of higher praise. The characters of Sherlock Holmes and Professor Moriarity are taken respectively by Paulin Broquet and Zigomar. The actors, taking these parts, are masters of their art. With many of the original and clever touches that abound in every reel, the first few scenes impress this fact upon the spectator very forcibly by showing on the screen the contrast between the two men in the most striking scenes and costumes that are to follow. It would transcend the limits allowed for this review, were we to attempt even a condensed description of the numerous plots and counterplots, which develop out of a battle of wits between Broquet and Zigomar. We can only allude briefly to some of the most notable scenes. In the crypt of the Church Saint Magloire a secret passageway allows Zigomar, the chieftain of the modern bandits, to hold revels or councils of his evil band. This hiding place, shown in a startlingly realistic manner in the film, is discovered by Broquet, who, encased in a suit of steel, disguises himself as the reposing statue of a knight upon one of the tombstones. He boldly advances into the secret retreat of the bandits and is caught in a trap, specially prepared for prospective intruders by the craft and cunning of the wily Zigomar. Broquet is carried away in a wooden box on a wagon that is to unload its living but hidden burden into a river. The driver is arrested on suspicion and the box on the wagon is opened by two gendarmes, who find their chief within, half dead. The driver, taking advantage of the excitement, mounts the horse of one of the gendarmes, but is hotly pursued by Broquet, who has quickly recovered from his stupor. A most realistic and thrilling scene ensues. Broquet shoots at the fleeing rider and brings him wounded to the ground, and a moment later himself topples from his horse, which has been shot from ambush by one of the followers of Zigomar. The bandit gives Broquet information which leads to new pursuits and hairbreadth escapes. The scenes in the Alps, where Zigomar has gone to rob hotels, are taken from nature in a country where nature is most charming, wonderful and impressive. The ascent of the mountain by the disguised robber and a distinguished company, of which Broquet, also in disguise, forms a part, is rich in realistic incident. Zigomar falls down the side of a glacier for a distance that seems alarmingly long to the spectator. The scenes in the Moulin Rouge, the "Danse des Feux Follets" (Fire Dance), the procession preceding the arrival of the dancer, the groupings of uncommonly handsome women, ranging from the "petite" to the statuesque and all faultless types, is a spectacle, the like of which, for art, power and charm, we have never seen in moving pictures before.

Scenes from "Zigomar" (Eclair).

Photographically, these pictures are nothing less than perfection. The traces of the superior skill of an able producer and "regisseur" are felt throughout. To give the picture due and full appreciation, pages would be necessary instead of columns.

"CARR'S REGENERATION" (Vitagraph).

Carr's regeneration, or the regeneration of a "grouch," is a story along new lines. Carr is evidently a discontented miserable fellow, at odds with everybody; he does not seem to have a kindly streak in his nature, or a good word in his mouth. The story begins with him leaving the hospital, which he does in disdain, without a word of thanks to those who have cared for and cured him, snatching his discharge as though it were something he was entitled to and which was being withheld from him.

Finding employment in a children's park, he acts like a bear among the young people, and is disrespectful to the young ladies in charge. A crippled girl is especially anxious to please and reconcile him, but he treats her with equal resentment; even when she tells him that the boys are going to resent his treatment by some trick, he angrily drives her from him. The boys, however, succeed in turning the hose on him, and give him a good drenching.

About this time a young lady points out to him the rotten condition of the rope of the children's swing. Carr goes to procure a new one, but stops to "take a nap"; aroused by shouting he hastens to the children and finds that through his delay his little crippled friend has fallen from the swing through the breaking of the rope. This event strikes home to his conscience in so thorough a manner as to bring about his regeneration.

Carr is now a changed man, respectful to his superiors and kindly to all the children, by whom he is soon regarded with great joy as he shows great big brotherly interest in all their games. The former "grouch" is now a generous, kindly soul.

This is a playlet, the burden of which falls chiefly on the character of Carr, which is well sustained by Mr. E. K. Phillips well supported by Vitagraph talent.

"LOST IN THE JUNGLE" (Selig).

"Lost in the Jungle," the last of the great series of Selig films produced last winter, in which wild animals have been used in the development of the story, and of which "Back to the Primitive" and "Captain Kate" have proved notable productions, will be released Monday, October 26. It is understood that the Selig Company will not discontinue the production of films of this type and that another series will be prepared during the approaching winter.

Mr. Wm. N. Selig believes that "Lost in the Jungle" is the climax of the series. Miss Kathlyn Williams, who appears in the principal rôle, says that over eight weeks were required to train the elephant to perform his part, and that many hundreds of oranges, bananas and other tempting fruits were bestowed on the big animal before he was quite won over to play the rôle of deliverer. Nor must we forget the important assistance rendered by "Big Otto," the well-known animal trainer, during the weeks of persistent and patient rehearsal.

Every one who views the picture will feel like hugging the ponderous brute when he kneels and assists the helpless girl to catch his ears with her hands, in the meantime making a seat of his trunk on which she rests, as he ploughs his way through the thick undergrowth of the jungle. It is a thrilling rescue and fairly startles one by its novelty and realism.

Another thrill is promised in the girl's encounter with a leopard. Shortly before this scene appears, we witness a fierce fight between two leopards and a wild hog, the latter coming out victor. This prepares us for the presence of leopards in the girl's vicinity, and when we see her crouch and listen intently, as she gazes into the depths of the forest, we are prepared for a life and death struggle. The large knife that she carries is gripped more firmly and, like a flash, a leopard rushes torward her and springs full upon her head. The next view taken by the camera shows the girl lying wounded and spent, while beside her lies the leopard turning over on his back in the death throes.

In the making of this scene Miss Williams suffered such severe scalp wounds from the animal's claws that nine stitches were required to close them, and she was covered with blood to her waist. A leopard is very fond of wild chickens, and at the first rehearsal of the scene, before the camera man began to turn the handle, everything went well. The chicken was thrown slightly behind and to one side of Miss Williams, as the animal was loosed from his cage, so that he fairly caught sight of its fall. In the second trial the chicken was thrown directly behind Miss Williams, out of the camera's field; and although the leopard saw that the chicken had been thrown, he did not see it fall, and concluded that it was under Miss Williams. The courage shown by this lady, and her wonderful influence over wild animals, in the production of this film, are really remarkable.

"THE HUMAN SACRIFICE" (Reliance).

Under the title of "The Human Sacrifice, or the Bride of the Nile," the Reliance Company has released a remarkably fine subject. The picture is based upon the Egyptian legend to the effect that a sacrifice to the Spirit of the Nile of a beautiful maiden was necessary to insure an abundance of water, so indispensable to the growth of the corn. In a succession of scenes are shown the people praying for rain; appealing to Pharaoh and to their gods for relief from the drouth which threatens to creat a famine among them.

After much incantation, the priests announce that living sacrifice to Isis is demanded, and the populace forthwith bring lambs, cattle and other living creatures as an offering to the gods. Finally the priests announce that a maiden must be sacrificed. Several are brought, that a selection may be made. One is chosen by the high priest. While the girl's relatives are reconciled, her lover is frantic with grief and plans to rescue her from the fate that is decreed. His attempt is unsuccessful, and in the final scene the maiden is cast into the waters of the Nile.

The several scenes are marked with grandeur of settings and by the splendid action of the players. Egyptian architecture in all its barbaric splendor and magnificence characterizes every scene. The assembling of the people and the mob scenes have the stamp of reality and are convincing.

Beautiful photography completes this masterful subject which will be welcomed by every exhibitor and which will add to the reputation of Reliance.

EXHIBITORS' AND LECTURERS' KEY TO DANTE'S INFERNO.

The Moving Picture World, anxious to see the great artistic production of Dante's Inferno (Milano Films) properly presented, has printed the above-named book for the purpose of aiding the exhibitor who wishes to show the attraction in his house. The book is based upon the presentation of the reels at Baltimore and Providence under the direction of W. Stephen Bush. Lecture, music and effects all have an important share in the successful presentation, and the author with considerable care and patience has gone over every single scene and given it a proper placing. The lecture, which may be easily learned, runs in exact conformity with the action on the screen, and for this reason is welcome to every audience. Wherever possible the words of the poet have been followed in the lecture. In the matter of effects, experience has shown that the effects indicated in the book are, without exception, appropriate and striking. Effects worked by a competent man, carefully following the instructions laid down in the book, add very much to the force and realism of the picture. It is plain that a proper presentation will get more money and secure a longer engagement than a careless and ignorant handling. This will be doubly true by the time the films get around to the later exhibitors, for the novelty of the thing will then have worn off a little and a proper presentation will be more important than ever.

The book contains a set of press notices, full instructions to lecturer, piano player and operator, a very complete lecture and much other matter, such as special keys, a biography of Dante, some of which may with advantage be reprinted for general distribution among the audience. The price of the book is $1.00. Special rebates are given when quantities are ordered.

Advertising for Exhibitors

Conducted by EPES WINTHROP SARGENT.

FULL page advertisements of photo playhouses are rare indeed, but the Plaza Theater, Washington, D. C., takes a page of the Herald every Sunday morning announcing the bills for the week, each title accompanied by a two by three and a half inch cut showing a scene from the reel. The Plaza, if we are not mistaken, is under the management of Tom Moore, who used to represent the General Film Company in that city, though Independent reels are made the attraction at the house.

Full-page advertising is a welcome sign of enterprise, but unless the page is the result of a special deal, it would seem that a more effective use of the advertising appropriation might have been made by diverting a portion of the money to the Post, reaching a broader field of readers, though the price of a half page in the Herald would not pay for similar space in the Post. At the same time an eighth page in the paper of larger circulation would bring results as good, if not better, and there is still the Herald half page. Advertising is most profitably done on a basis of circulation, rather than upon cost and space, always with the proviso that the circulation is amongst the class the advertiser desires to reach.

A ten-line advertisement in a paper like the Saturday Evening Post will cost as much as a half page in some small weekly, but it will reach nearly a hundred times as many readers, and yet a $50 advertisement in the Post did not bring the results that a $15 advertisement did in The Editor when scripts were advertised for, because every copy of The Editor went into the hands of the writer, while the Post went to the readers.

In this instance, however, the Washington Post circulates among the possible patrons of the Plaza and would reach many readers who do not see the Herald. The Plaza is a "down-town" theater, drawing patrons from beyond its immediate territory, and a general appeal can effectively be made

Some Useful Catchlines.

There is a pleasant absence of the extravagant self-praise that too often mars advertising. Instead of "the best show in town," the line reads "Never equalled in Washington for the money." That is saying "best show," but it is saying it in a way that is convincing. It's a trifle heavy, perhaps, but it has the right ring. "If it's good we have it" is a good catchline. Others that might be used are "Come just once and you'll get the habit." "You don't know what you're missing—but why miss it?" "Two-dollar acting for a ten-cent ticket." "It's not the price that counts, but the quality."

Remember, you who do newspaper advertising, that you want the new man, not the regular patron. The man who comes to your theater once a week or more often does not have to be coaxed in. There's no use in paying from ten to fifty cents a line to get him in. He'll come anyhow. The man you should advertise for is the man you haven't got; the man who thinks that a ten-cent show can't be much good. Pull him in and add him to your collection, then go out after some more. Frame your advertising to reach the man who doesn't know how vastly different the modern photo-play theater is from the picture show of a couple of years ago, make him realize that the pictures to-day are well worth while, get him interested to the point where he drops in to see what you are making all the fuss about, and if you have the right sort of show you can hold him. Advertising is merely the bait, but remember that you're fishing for goldfish, not for suckers, and frame your advertising right.

Play Up Features.

It might be objected that this Plaza advertising is too formal in wording and display. There is a cross-page title at the top, a cross line and the bottom and two half-width boxes making reference to special Sunday shows at the Academy and the Gayety. The rest of the space is devoted to twelve boxes, each half a page in width, giving the twelve first runs for the week. There are but five lines that rise above twenty-four point, the cuts being relied upon for display. It is not a bad idea, but the space might better have been largely devoted to playing up a couple of specific releases on the merits of Charleston Flood and possibly "The Star Spangled."

By making direct appeal with these two features, by making the short quotation and attractive, the casual reader would have been more strongly impressed than on the attractively worded, but somewhat [illegible] subjects. The star in the spotlight's beam is more important than the grouped chorus, and the same idea applies to advertising. Give the list of releases for the week for the benefit of the regular patrons, but concentrate the effort on the stars. Make the chance reader interested in the features. If he comes Monday, the chances are that in the course of time "Imp," Bison," and the rest will be something more than names. He'll play favorites like the rest of the fans, but meanwhile they mean nothing to him. It's the Charleston Flood that is going to attract him into the house.

Don't Promise Too Much.

But in gaining the interest of the reader, it is important that too much should not be promised. The Plaza advertisement sounds the right note of appreciation in its descriptions, approved warmly but with a reserve that does not bring the patron into the theater expecting more than he will receive, and sending him out sore and disappointed, but the simple expedient of "playing up" these two films. Two small boys might, in concerted attack, thrash Jack Johnson, but two good heavyweights, working together, would stand a far better chance of success.

In playing up features it is better to make at least one a release for Monday or Tuesday, and much better to work it for Monday than Tuesday. Get him into the house before the impression wears off. He may forget by Friday or Saturday that he wants to go to the Plaza, but you can land him in Monday or Tuesday.

If the present scheme of individual boxes is adhered to, it would be well to alternate cuts and type. At present there are four strips of type or cuts running down the page, thus:

Type	Cut	Type	Cut
Type	Cut	Type	Cut
Type	Cut	Type	Cut

Better arrangements would be:

Cut	Type	Type	Cut
Type	Cut	Cut	Type
Cut	Type	Type	Cut

Or this:

Cut	Type	Type	Cut
Cut	Type	Type	Cut
Cut	Type	Type	Cut

In the latter form the fists, now used to connect the cut with its type could still be employed, using right and left hand fists as required.

A Line Worth While.

The card is interesting for its simple and direct wording. "We don't stop for supper. Come early," is definite and conveys much more than "continuous from 2 to 11 p.m.," and the entire card is well written.

And a word about cheap stock. The words are used above purely in a descriptive sense. As a card, by itself, it does not present an appearance of importance that will attract attention, but since the envelope does the introducing, the stock is plenty good enough, being on stiff white board that will not easily crease. Where an advertisement must catch the eye, better material is recommended, but here it is merely the secondary consideration. A heavy laid card would have been a needless expense.

The Tenth Street Theatre, of Kansas City, sends its third issue of the house program, getting down to the long run style with but two printings— in green and black. The design lacks the simple elegance of the first issue, but it still shows good taste and a sense of the artistic. If the cover is run off for each issue, it is suggested that by running in 100,000 lots, or even 50,000, the cost of press work may be materially lessened, or three colors be employed for the same cost, the black impression being held until time for press, that the wording of advertisement on the back covers may be changed.

It is possible to make a deal with some general advertiser for free covers in return for the back page, if it can be shown that the house clientele makes it worth while, in which case even the lithographed front may be reached.

Effective Color Combinations.

For straight printings we suggest these combinations:
Red on black.
Black on green.
Red on yellow.
Black, outlined with red, on yellow.
Purple on green (only if the right tints are used; dull tints of each).
Blue on brown.
White on gray (not quite strong enough as a rule).
Blue on gray (a bright blue and a strong gray).
Red on gray.
Purple on gray.
White on red and black.

The tint color is given second. Strong combinations, such as red and green or red and blue, should be avoided, and in most combinations, if the tint block is cut to show a white tracing, the effect is enhanced.

From the same program we borrow the appeal to the advertiser. It is capable of variation, but the essential points are here:

TO YOU, MR. ADVERTISER, we call especial attention to the fact that the Tenth Street Theater is giving continuous performances every day from 12 m. to 11 p. m., with five minutes intermission between shows, each show lasting one hour and fifteen minutes. Patrons are thus given the opportunity of reading over the program while waiting during intermissions, and as the program has the entire week's showings printed, with a change of bill daily, each day's program giving a full synopsis of all Photo-Plays shown, together with orchestra selections and special songs to be sung, which will cause 90 PER CENT. OF THE PROGRAMS TO BE TAKEN HOME. IN THE HOME—where the greatest results will come to the advertiser. Program circulation is based upon the popularity of a theater and the number of patrons attending daily. In view of these facts the TENTH STREET THEATER PROGRAM is without a peer in Kansas City as a publicity medium, through which the up-to-date advertiser can gain immediate and far-reaching results.

It is the publication that is taken into the home that gets the advertising, and if you can prove home circulation, you can get the advertising.

Appeal to Curiosity.

Effective use of the common trait of curiosity comes from the Imperial Theatre, the location of which is not stated. The main feature is a card which reads:

The Imperial Theatre

55th near Central Frank Hicks, Prop.

THIS TICKET with 5 cents will admit two persons to our Saturday or Sunday Matinee.

We run a "Double Show" on both Saturday and Sunday. The regular price of admission is 10 cents for adults and 5 cents for children.

We run a continuous show from 2:00 to 11:00 P. M. We don't stop for supper. COME EARLY.

This Ticket will not be honored unless presented before 6:30 p. m. After that hour the price of admission is 10c. for adults and 5c. for children.

By itself this card would be valueless, for it is printed on cheap stock, thought fairly effective in display. In two places the capitalized "This Ticket" is made to stand out to emphasize the fact that it is a ticket, and not merely an adverisement, but the chances are that few of the recipients would read it were it not enclosed in a manila envelope of the sort known as "pay envelopes" on which is printed in heavy black type, "I wonder what's in this?" It is precisely the sentiment of a majority of the readers—and curiosity is satisfied by reading the card.

It is effective if not used too long, since it not only builds up the matinee trade, but may build it up with new patrons, but a date limit would have been more impressive. Say, "Good only through September," or "Not valid after October 15th"; otherwise, the children will stock up on the cards and keep them out of general circulation.

MR. JOHN BUNNY,
The Vitagraph Funny Man and Versatile Player.

John Bunny, who is now character lead and comedian for the Vitagraph Company of America, is one of the most experienced actors in the profession. He has supported Roland Reed for three seasons; with Sol Smith Russell, special World's Fair Company; was with Maude Adams, first tour as star west of the Missouri River, special cast; has appeared in every branch of theatrical work, including Shakespeare, legitimate drama, and comic opera.

In 1897-98 he was manager and director of the Grand Opera House, Salt Lake City; from 1898 to 1905, he was stage manager and director for William A. Brady's productions, including "'Way Down East" and many others; 1905-6 he was with Henry W. Savage in "Easy Dawson"; 1906-7, as Bottom in "A Mid-Summer Night's Dream"; in 1907-8, Henry W. Savage's Opera Company in "Tom Jones"; 1908-9, Hattie Williams' Company in "Fluffy Ruffles"; 1909-10, Lew Fields' Company in "Old Dutch."

The Vitagraph "Bunnygraphs," which he has made so popular as Vitagraph releases, are always looked forward to by motion picture patrons with anticipated pleasure that is more than realized in every instance.

WALES ELECTRIC THEATER COMPANY.

Wales Electric Theater Company opened its seventh year on October 5th. This company, under the management of George H. Wales, is probably one of the oldest motion picture road companies in the country. For the past six seasons it has toured successfully a circuit of six cities in Northern Illinois, playing to good business throughout the hot weather and to S. R. O. when the weather was more favorable. An Edison machine of the best pattern is used, and the pictures are selected from the Spoor branch of the General Film Company, in Chicago, under the personal supervision of Mr. Redfield. Unique advertising methods attract unusual attention to Mr. Wales's entertainments and he says the Moving Picture World is a welcome visitor and is fairly devoured by the different members of his company.

CORRECTION.

In the article, "Lecture on Foul Play," published on page 28 of the last issue, the name "Proserpine" should be substituted for "Prosperine" in line 6 of the second column. In line 12 of the same column the word "Shannon" is to take the place of the word "Proserpine."

Observations by our Man About Town

A MONTHLY magazine recently gave space to an article that served no other purpose than to add strength to the contention that many contributors to such publications are not in touch with the conditions upon which they attempt to enlighten the reading public. A Mr. Matthew White, Jr., attempted to reveal the secret that has brought about the success of motion pictures as box-office drawing cards, but lamentably failed. In part his solution is that thousands of people who patronize picture theaters do so because they have not the means with which to attend higher priced amusements. To an extent he is right in this, but his statement only applies to the picture houses located in the poorer districts and for that reason it is weak. His declaration that pretty girls posted in glass cages as cashiers are important factors is as ridiculous as his contention that "the film habit distinctly lacks class."

The facts are that the cheap price of admission started the tide of popularity, but today the pictures are not dependent upon it. The continual advancement made by the manufacturers toward improving the construction and production of the pictures, and the improvement in the theaters producing the films have won the approbation of the amusement public to an extent that the higher priced amusements find their strongest competitor in them. As to "class," it would be well for the contributor to try to find it. He would have little difficulty in doing so. It is unfair to select for the purpose of criticism only the cheaper houses in the poorer districts where the shows are of a grade based upon economic conditions. Mr. White's version is very effectively controverted by the number of "classy" managers who have taken the pictures into their houses after endeavoring for several years to stem the tide of their popularity.

I understand that Lyman H. Howe will have permanent location in Manhattan this winter. His success in the picture field has been phenomenal. He was one of the original road show promoters and is the survivor of scores. In the opinion of many, some of his undertakings have been little short of audacious. He goes into large cities for long runs and takes money by the thousands. When he projected his recent engagement in Chicago the picture men of that city expressed pity for him. All they could see was failure. About two years ago he successfully conducted a season of Sunday exhibitions at the New York Hippodrome, so that he is not a stranger.

The photoplay director has more troubles than those immediately attending the supervising of productions. A director begged that I do everything possible to discourage about ninety per cent. of the young women and young men seeking positions in picture studios. "I do not know how they get my name," said he, "but they do, and they sometimes have me tormented to a point of desperation. And I am not the only sufferer. The same complaint is made by every director I know. They hound us at the studio, hotels and any place they learn we frequent. If they would only accept a polite reply in the negative the burden would not be so hard to bear. An attempt to give them some fatherly advice is like putting a flame to gasoline. Of course I do not refer to professionals. We can handle them easily enough. They have sense and understand what a waiting list means. The pests I mean are the little Marys and Willies who have met with stupendous success on the Sunday school platform and who, backed by the enthusiasm of a horde of relatives, feel that the salvation of the photoplay is dependent upon their talent. Yes, that's the term, 'talent.' Miss So-and-So comes to me and says, 'I have been sent to you by Mr. ——, who runs a large picture house. I want to pose in your pictures.' 'Have you had any experience?' I ask, and nine out of ten come back with the reply, 'No, but I have the talent.'

"It is awful at times" continued the director, "and in many instances I have found it necessary to become far more abrupt than I desire. Some of the applicants will argue and almost demand a trial, saying that they only ask the same opportunity other men [illegible] have had. One young woman held me up for almost an hour one day when I was seeking rest after a hard [illegible]. I couldn't get rid of her. Her cleverness balked all my efforts. Her persistence finally won me and I decided upon a test. I sent her to a dressing room to make up for an imaginary part, leaving her to her own resources. She was in the dressing room a long time. What she accomplished I do not know. Her departure from the studio was very unceremonious and her application has not been renewed."

A large percentage of the young people who become stage-struck imagine that players in the pictures are not required to have professional stage experience. They think the parts can be portrayed with ease by almost anybody because there are no lines to be spoken. Others depend upon beauty of features and form to get them in the stock companies. Experience has no weight in their minds. In the earlier days amateurs easily entered the ranks and professionals were the exception. Some of these amateurs are still in the business and are making good because they have kept up with the progress of studio work. But the opportunity for amateurs has gone. All first-class studios now require talent that has been developed. They cannot spare the time to train aspirants. They have a certain number of photoplays to get out in specified periods, and to do so their operations must be carried out quickly and as near perfection as possible. Quality and quantity work hand in hand these days and the directors who rank best in their line of business are those who can produce a picture with the least number of rehearsals. It is obvious that a director with a bunch of amateurs on his hands cannot accomplish this. We frequently hear of born actors and actresses, but the photoplay director is not disposed to put much faith in it. He is a very busy man and looks only to the practical. He is told that time is money and to hold his job must guide himself accordingly.

In many instances the studio annoyances complained of are due to mischievousness on the part of people having easily influenced acquaintances. They think it a good joke to send young people to the studios on a fool's errand. I heartily sympathize with a young woman who came to me recently with a story of imposition of this character. She was inexperienced and had unsuccessfully tried for some time to secure a studio engagement. She had sought my aid in that direction without result, but one day came to me with a telegram addressed to her and asking that she report to a studio in Chicago. It surprised her because she had not applied to the studio and up to the time she called upon me did not know of its existence. I surmised that the young woman was the victim of a so-called practical joke, but her intense desire to get into pictures made her inclined to discount my judgment. Acting upon her own impulse, however, she wired the studio and received a reply that the original telegram was a fraud. The cruel part of the affair was that all the telegrams were at the young woman's expense, but the fortunate feature was that her enthusiasm did not carry her to Chicago. It subsequently developed that some of her acquaintances had prevailed upon a traveling friend to send the original wire from Chicago. It looked for a time like a costly practical joke for them, but the young woman relented.

I see a firm in Paris claims to have secured the first cinematograph film in which Thomas A. Edison has posed, the picture having been made while Mr. Edison was strolling along one of the boulevards of the city. The claim is ruled out. The first picture was taken on this side of the big pond about two years ago, when a banquet was tendered to Mr. Edison on his birthday anniversary. The inventor was shown greeting in turn as they passed him each of the manufacturers and others in attendance. The film was a short one and was not given public exhibition. Prints of it were subsequently issued as souvenirs of the banquet.

Essanay Company Plans Greatest Baseball Film.

"Athletics"-"Giants" Struggle. Fourth Consecutive Film of World's Championship Baseball Series.

THE National Baseball Commission has again awarded the Essanay Film Manufacturing Company, of Chicago, the exclusive rights to motograph the World's Championship baseball series, which makes the Essanay Company pre-eminent as makers of great baseball films. The 1911 series film is the fourth consecutive picture of this great annual sporting event to be made by the Essanay.

If the elaborate plans of the Essanay Company work out as expected and aided by good motion picture weather, which means sunny skies and clear atmosphere, the 1911 series film will be much superior in every way to the series films of previous years.

Aside from scenes of straight playing, the incidentals of the game this year have been carefully planned. All of the important stars of the diamond will be pictured in close-up views; there will be a complete panorama of the parks both at New York and at Philadelphia. Novel and unique scenes showing in close-up views the science and the skill of the various infield and outfield players, their methods of stopping grounders, of catching flies, of stealing bases and sliding for home, will lend zest and new interest to the game. Views of the crowds, of important baseball officials, mascots, etc., will, of course, be included.

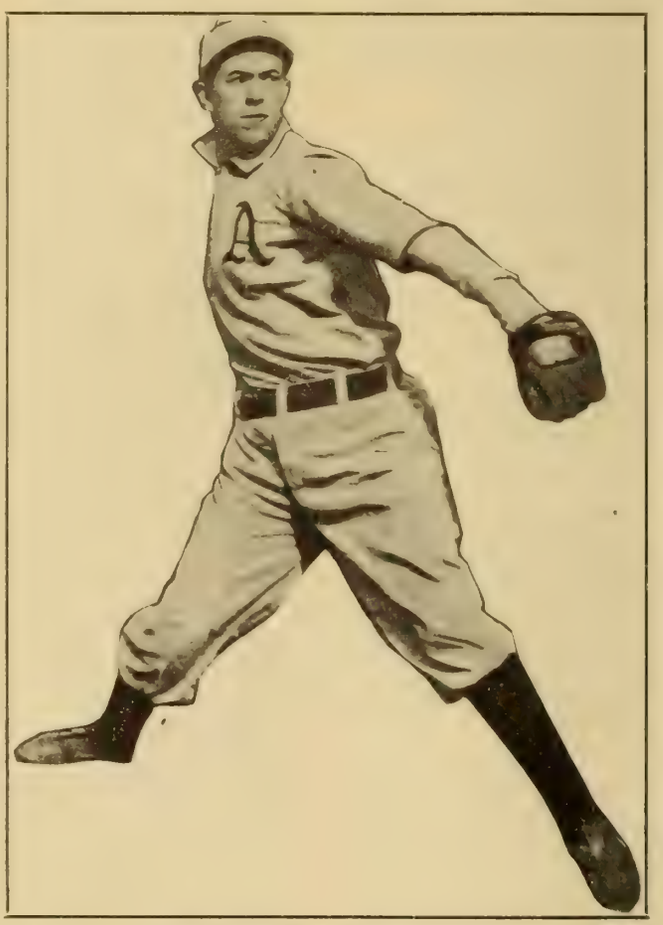
To exhibitors in the Eastern States this year's series game in films will, perhaps, prove of more value, as it is the first time in several years that two Eastern teams have competed for the pennant. Not since 1905 have the Giants, the New York Nationals, figured in a world's series, and this was before any baseball pictures had been made.

With such stars as McGraw, Mathewson, Marquard, Merkle, Wiltse, Doyle, and others, who have never yet appeared on the screen to tempt the nickels, New York exhibitors will reap a harvest in this year's crop of films.

Already seats at the Polo Grounds, which it is estimated can seat 75,000 fans, are nearly all sold out for the New York games, while it is expected that the Philadelphia representation at Shibe Park, the Athletics' home plate, will be as large.

The Giants' struggle with the Chicago bearlings in the few games preceding the series proved that the cubs were hard diers, and this interest evinced by the Chicago fans who hoped patriotically to the last ditch will undoubtedly be a stimulant to the reception the series films will have in Chicago, and especially since the Mackmen of Philadelphia won the pennant. Chicago fandom will turn out to the last man to see living pictures of the Athletics administering the last rites at the bier of the Giants.

This is the second year that Connie Mack's youngsters have appeared on the screen, and a revival of their little sketch will be received with no less enthusiasm and interest than was evinced last year. There is Bender, Coombs, McInnes, Eddie Collins, and a score of other heroes, who so successfully and conclusively trimmed the Murphy cubs of Chicago last year. "Big Chief" Bender will do some stunts in twirling exclusively for the camera, while there will be specialties in all other branches of the various arts of batting, catching and base-stealing put on for the particular edification of baseball-picture fans.



Guy Coombs, of the Athletics.

This is the fourth world series filmed by the Essanay Company. The first series film, pictured in 1908, illustrated the fight for the pennant between the two Chicago teams, the Cubs and Sox. The 1909 series films showed the combat between the Detroit "Tigers" and the Pittsburg "Pirates," while the "Cubs" and the "Athletics" held forth last year. This year's games will show what kind of stuff the Athletics are made of, and it is a sure thing that they will put up a grand little fight for the flag.

While the Essanay Company are the foremost makers of sporting films, they shine particularly bright in baseball, and besides the regular annual series games they have several other baseball features to their credit. Two years ago they released a feature under the title of "Taft in Chicago and at the Ball Game," and showed some excellent views of the President in the grandstand, cheering the Cubs and Giants at the game he attended. A baseball comedy, appearing during the middle of each summer, has always been welcomed by the picture lovers. The first one made was "The Baseball Fan"; the second,

McInnes. Bender. Lord.

Myers. McGraw, Manager. Mathewson.

last year's comedy, appeared under the title of "Take Me Out to the Ball Game," while this year's contribution was released under the title of "The Baseball Star From Bingville."

The interest in the Essanay's baseball films are not merely nation-wide, but the films have been shown in Great Britain and Ireland, Australia, South Africa, and in the Philippine Islands.

This year's release will be made much earlier than any preceding series film, and will be released on Thursday, October 26th, just a few days following the final game. With football crowding close on the heels of the national summer sport, this early release will be of advantage to the exhibitors, although there has always been an eager crowd to view the films when exhibited as late as January and February, and there is inevitably a revival of the films in the early spring, while they are shown all the following summer during the baseball season. Orders for extra prints of last year's series films were received by the Essanay Company as late as June of this year.

An elaborate poster, depicting a thrilling play on the diamond, with pictures of the well known stars of both teams and otherwise handsomely decorated, are now ready for distribution at the various licensed exchanges.

The world's series film will be released under the title of "Athletics vs. Giants," and will be handled by the licensed exchanges exclusively. No [illegible] the right to buy the exhibition of the films will be granted, and all the licensed exhibitors will each have a fair opportunity of getting the films for early release.

ORPHEUM, CHICAGO, INSTALLS X-RAY SYSTEM.

The Eye Comfort System of indirect illumination has recently been installed throughout the auditorium of the Orpheum Theater, Chicago. The opinion of all theater owners who visit this theater is that the result is an improvement in every way—a much lighter house, a better picture, more ornamental and harmonious fixtures and, best of all, a beautiful quality of light.

As is well known, the Orpheum is one of the most beautiful theaters in the moving picture world today. The main floor dimensions are 80 by 38 feet, with a 40-foot ceiling, and the balcony has a floor space of 1,810 square feet. The total seating capacity is 750. An elaborate classic design decorates the ceiling and walls, which is further carried out by the classic Grecian bowl lighting unit. Eight fixtures (as shown in cut I) are installed above the balcony, and six brass bowls (as shown in cut II) below the balcony. The balcony being so large it is possible to consider the lighting above the balcony separately from that below the balcony. The ceiling beneath the balcony of this theater curves up from a 13-foot ceiling to a 17-foot height at the rear, which permits of a brightly lighted entrance without the slightest interference with the picture.

Cut No. 2.

The three Indirect fixtures at the rear are therefore equipped to produce a more intense illumination. The light from the other four units below the balcony is gradually reduced as the stage is approached, and as the reflected light from the screen increases in intensity. These two factors—the indirect lighting and the reflection from the screens, when properly taken into account, result in a uniform illumination from stage to entrance. This uniformity is what produces the pleasing effect upon the eye as one enters any theater properly lighted by the Eye Comfort System.

Not considering the emergency lights required by law, the house was originally lighted during the performance by one 60-watt clear bulb tungsten lamp located at the rear above the balcony, and by three 60-watt tungsten lamps below the balcony. There are now in use one 60-watt lamp in each of the four rear fixtures above the balcony and seven 60-watt lamps properly distributed among the various fixtures beneath the balcony. And still with this increased intensity, the picture is much clearer and better defined. The reason for this fact is that, where before, if a light of desirable intensity was reflected toward the picture at all, the picture was ruined; if it was reflected away from the picture and toward the audience, it was thrown into the yes of the people.

Now, by using powerful X-ray reflectors to throw the light to the ceiling, the picture is improved; the people can see without interference, and only that portion of the light is lost which it is desirable to lose; namely, the glare from the high-efficiency tungsten lamp.

Other notable theater installations of this system are: the Colonial, Indianapolis, Ind.; Princess, Milwaukee, Wis.; Pabst, Milwaukee, Wis.; Orpheum, Duluth, Minn; Royal, Winnipeg, Canada; Monarch, Edmondton, Canada; Orpheum, Peoria, Ill.; Plaza, San Antonio, Texas; Majestic, Fort Worth, Texas, and the Plaza, Chicago, Ill.

MAKING THEATERS PANIC PROOF.

Manufacturers of safety devices for theaters claim that there is a steadily increasing demand upon the part of theater owners for the latest and most practical devices calculated to make their theaters safer in case of fire or panic. This demand is accounted for in two ways: one is that theater managers feel that they must protect themselves and their business from criticism, and the other is that the authorities are more exacting in the enforcement of the laws providing for greater safety in theaters, school houses and other places where the public congregates in large numbers.

Among the manufacturers of safety devices the Vonnegut Hardware Company is entitled to mention for the excellence of a peculiar device handled by it. Many have heard of the Von Duprin Self-releasing Fire Exit, but a further and careful investigation will prove the exceptional utility thereof. By means of this device it is possible to lock "exit" doors against outside communication, but they are never locked against exit from the inside. While there are many picture theaters equipped with these appliances, the percentage is smaller than it should be when comparison is made with the legitimate dramatic houses. Picture theater managers should be able to print upon their programs the statement "This theater is equipped with every modern device against panic disasters."

Increasing inquiries would seem to indicate that the percentage of installations of safety appliances will be rapidly increased. The Vonnegut Hardware Company will be pleased to show picture men how they can equip their exit doors with the Von Duprin device.

CHICAGO LETTER.

By Jas. S. McQuade.

INDEPENDENT manufacturers received a severe shock recently when cablegrams from London were received, advising them that all orders for Independent films had been canceled in Australia. The reason assigned was that one McCullough, in Sydney, was beating the releases of West, Williams and Spencer, the three leading exchange owners in Australia.

The question that disturbed the manufacturers most was the source of supply, and since receiving the information, rigorous examination has been made of all recent shipments of films from the United States to Australia. Some indication of their having discovered the nigger in the woodpile is shown by the action of the Sales Company in suspending shipments to the Laemmle Alliance exchange, of Portland, Ore., on Monday, Oct. 2.

The Laemmle Alliance is owned, I understand, by E. J. McCullough, who purchased it from Carl Laemmle for $12,000 near the close of 1909, or early in 1910. Mr. McCullough is residing in Sydney at present and has been there for the past six months, as near as can be ascertained. He is an ex-clergyman, it is said, and at one time represented the interests of the late John Alexander Dowie, of Zion fame, in Australia.

His first connection with the film business was made when the Passion Play came out. He purchased that film and traveled throughout the country giving exhibitions and lecturing on the subject. While thus engaged in Portland, he became connected with the Laemmle Exchange here and had charge of the office in 1908.

Inquiries made reveal that Mr. McCullough has been honest in his dealings while in this country, and always a man of his word. Just how he is connected with the secret importation of films into Australia has not yet been revealed. Nor has it been discovered whether or not duped film has been shipped.

About three months ago a man called Schwartz stopped over in Chicago for a few days and called on several Independents. He was anxious to know if he could secure Independent films direct from America for Australia, instead of through London, and in one instance stated that he would get them direct from this country, whether the Independent manufacturers liked it or not. Schwartz hailed from Australia, I understand, and after his stay here went on to New York. He, most likely, is connected with the present flooding of Australia with duped (or otherwise) Independent films. The action on the license of McCullough's Portland exchange and his presence in Sydney would seem to show that he also is connected with the scheme.

"Colleen Bawn" High in Favor.

William Wright, of the Kalem Company, was in the city Wednesday, September 27, and gave a private exhibition of Kalem's big feature film, "The Colleen Bawn," for licensed exhibitors, at the Theatorium, on State Street. Invitations had been sent by letter, well in advance, and the theater was crowded.

Mr. Wright gave an interesting and instructive address before the exhibition began, touching on the great painstaking and care exercised in the production of the three reels of film, so as to have every scene and background, and property and costume, locally and historically correct.

At the close of the exhibition the opinion was unanimous that "Colleen Bawn" is a strong feature with fine photography and picturesquely beautiful settings.

The acting is praiseworthy and the production is of distinctly high merit.

Mr. Wright left for Kansas City, where an exhibition had been arranged Thursday, Sept. 28; St. Louis and Pittsburg followed.

The first private exhibition was given at the Vendome Theater, Buffalo, on Sept. 25. The following day, Cleveland was visited, the Hippodrome Theater being placed at Mr. Wright's disposal. In both towns "The Colleen Bawn" was received with great favor by exhibitors.

Blind and Deaf Boy Acts in a Picture.

One day last week I met Harry L. Virden and a blind and deaf boy called Walcott Coombs, whom he has befriended as few men ever befriend a stranger.

Walcott is but seven [illegible] years old and, although [illegible] from the [illegible] of vision and sweet sounds, he owes it to Professor Virden that all is not darkness and gloom [illegible] he has pictured the joys and happiness of his fellows.

It is [illegible] years since Mr. Virden took upon himself the burden of this helpless youth. Ten years ago, down in [illegible], the boy was stricken with scarlet fever, which made him deaf and deprived him of the sight of one eye. In less than a year the remaining eye was blind through nervous sympathy. In course of time he lost the power of articulation, and when Mr. Virden first met him, the sounds he uttered were unintelligible.

What a task was here to reach the benighted soul! But Mr. Virden, who has devoted his life to education, took up the burden with faith and confidence. He saw that the boy must be his constant companion, in order to accomplish the purpose in view, and so he has supported the lad as well as taught him for the past three years, the boy's parents being poor.

It is not necessary here to enter into the methods employed by Mr. Virden. It is sufficient to state some of the results.

In the presence of several newspaper men and myself, over in the Selig Polyscope Company's city office, we saw Walcott write a letter with a typewriting machine, draw the outline of objects felt by him, knit cotton rugs and hammocks, and perform numerous other feats that, in his case, might be termed marvelous. The wooden knitting needle used by him was made by himself. Mr. Virden told us, and we were further informed that Walcott could knit fancy and fluff rugs and make chair seating material.

By means of the numeral system used by deaf mutes, Mr. Virden introduced each one present to the boy, and it was pleasant to hear him say intelligibly, "I am glad to meet you."

"But what has this to do with moving pictures?" you ask. Well, Mr. William N. Selig is making an educational film in which Walcott will be seen in his various avocations by millions of clear-sighted eyes. Mr. Virden will be seen also and the methods used by him to educate the lad will doubtless be viewed with great interest.

It is Walcott's dearest ambition to be a university graduate, and Mr. Virden promised him that he would be, although a few days ago he had never dreamed where the money would come from. The other day Mr. Selig solved the big problem. He will furnish the money. And now it is hard to say who is the happier—philanthropic Mr. Virden or blind and deaf Walcott.

Thomas A. Edison, Inc., vs. Swanson.

The case of Thomas A. Edison, Inc., against Wm. H. Swanson, doing business as Wm. H. Swanson & Co., and Thomas Mitchell, who acts as the Chicago manager, is being argued at the time of writing in the United States Circuit Court here.

Among the charges made by counsel for complainant are the following: that the defendant Wm. H. Swanson, conducting an unincorporated business, known as Wm. H. Swanson & Co., has an office and machine shop at 150 Lake Street, Chicago, and that Thomas Mitchell is employed by him as manager of said office and machine shop; that Swanson manufactures moving picture projecting machines in said shop, under Mitchell's direction, by assembling various parts and mechanisms either manufactured in the shop or procured by Swanson and Mitchell from various manufacturers of the same, which parts and mechanisms thus made or procured are close imitations of the parts and mechanisms used by Thomas A. Edison, Inc., and its predecessors in the construction of the projecting machines made by them, especially the Edison exhibition model machine. That said parts and mechanisms are assembled in the same arrangement as are the parts of the projecting machines made and sold by the orator, and the mechanisms so assembled are provided with enclosed casings which are made in close imitation of the casings used by the orator on the projecting machines marketed by it. It is further alleged that the projecting machines so made and assembled are close imitations of the types of projecting machines made and sold by the orator, particularly the Edison exhibition model machine, and tend to deceive the public and the trade into the belief that they are the machines of the manufacture of the orator or the orator's predecessor, because of their resemblance in appearance thereto. The orator further alleges that the resemblance referred to is intentional on the part of the defendants, and that the machines so put out by the defendants are practically "Chinese copies" of the machines of the orator and its immediate predecessor, and that the whole course of the defendants is calculated to deceive the public as stated, as will be hereinafter set forth.

That the defendants have sold many of the projecting machines so assembled and are habitually engaged in selling such machines in such a manner as to cause the purchasers thereof to be deceived into the belief that they are purchasing machines made by the orator, or his predecessor, which conduct has caused great and irreparable loss to the orator and its immediate predecessor and caused the deception and confusion of the public and the trade, and that the machines so sold by the defendants and imitating the orator's product in appearance carried no name, serial number, or other indication of the fact that they were the product of the defendant Swanson.

Chicago Film Brevities.

Morton Cohn and wife, of Portland, Oregon, are spending a few days in the city on their way home from New York.

W. A. Peterson, the veteran and well-known manager of the Colonial theaters at Bloomington and Joliet, Ill., was a visitor last week. He states that his business is increasing steadily.

Manager McMullen, of the Colonial Theater, Rockford, Ill., was in the city last week and booked several special releases at the offices of the G. F. Co., at 17 S. Wabash. Mr. McMullen states that business is away in advance of what it was at the same time last year. Mr. McMullen was accompanied by Manager Noben, of the Rockford theater, who recently purchased that house from Mr. Clark. Mr. Noben was very well satisfied with his box-office receipts. Mr. Clark is now in Kansas City and expects to re-enter the exhibiting business at an early date.

Reports received by Manager F .C. Aiken, of the G. F. Co.'s branch, 17 S. Wabash, from Charles Vance, who recently opened the new Dawn in Streator, Ill., are very encouraging. High-class exclusive pictures are steadily winning patrons for the Dawn. The Dreamland, also owned by Mr. Vance, is doing well with an exclusive picture program.

The opening of the new Idle Hour, of Milwaukee, has been postponed by Manager Wagner from September 30 to October 7.

Manager Cochrane, of the new Bell Theater, North Avenue, Milwaukee, visited the G. F. Co.'s branch at 17 S. Wabash last week and arranged for the bookings for the opening of his house, Saturday, October 7. He also purchased an Edengraph machine and an Edison transformer. The new Bell cost $50,000 and seats 1,200 people.

Miss May O. Hill, owner of the Hill Theater, Watseka, Ill., contracted with the G. F. Co.'s branch, at 17 S. Wabash, for a high quality service starting Saturday, October 7.

Manager Baldwin, of the Orpheum, Wis., was in the city last week, and stated that the remodeling of his theater cost several thousand dollars. He arranged for a high-class service with Manager Aiken at 17 S. Wabash. The Orpheum will re-open October 15.

AMONG THE CHICAGO PICTURE THEATERS.

By C. Young.

The Glenwood Theater, at North Clark Street and Buckingham Place, is one of the prettiest little theaters in Chicago. The front is free from the usual plaster and paint decorations, and is mainly of stained glass in green shades, which is very beautiful at night when illuminated from behind with electric lights. Conspicuous on the front are the words, "Glenwood Theater," and below them, "Moving Pictures." The interior of the theater is as pretty as the front. The walls are frescoed with sprays of a flowering vine; the exit and entrance ways are attractive, and even the exit signs are artistic, being made of stained glass in red, with the word "EXIT" in white capitals. The house lights are of unique design, being located on the side walls, with the lamps enclosed in handsome lanterns, somewhat like the side lights in some other houses. The seats of the house are large, substantial and comfortable, and several fans on the walls make the patrons forget the heat.

But—in this beautiful home for the motion picture, what is the picture itself? Is it a thing of beauty and a joy to the eye? Candor compels me to say no. The side lights are not shaded, being ground glass globes with partly dipped green lamps inside, and as they cast their light directly on the screen, the shadows are not as deep as they should be; besides, much light reaches the screen through the pretty glass front of the house. Projection itself is not up to the average of the better Chicago picture show; the picture is rather unsteady, due to the machine being poorly secured to the floor, and the operator's "whirr-whirr-rr" habit of putting much more force on the down stroke of the crank than necessary and depending on the flywheels to carry the gearing around for the rest of the turn. The light on the picture is by no means bright, and there is a deplorable ghost in the center of the screen. The picture on the curtain, too, is framed badly. The floor of the house has but little pitch, which would make an elevated picture a desirable thing; but here the picture is framed very low on the curtain, with the result that the lower part of it is invisible to the greater part of the audience. There is no real excuse for this, as there is nearly three feet of blank space on the screen above the upper margin of the picture; the picture could be raised to this extent to great advantage. The side lights ought to be shaded, or else deep green lamps used in them, which will light the house sufficiently without injuring the picture seriously. The ghost in the picture is a bad thing, and ought to be removed by pulling the lamphouse back from the machine, which can be done. These defects in the picture are the more noticeable because of the beautiful house in which they are shown, and ought to be remedied. The machine is an excellent one, an Edengraph, and the film service is first-class, Licensed, one and two weeks old, so that there is no fault to be found with this part of the show. Manager Harlow admitted that he was a new man in the picture business, and for that reason he ought to study the projection conditions in his theater and make his picture the best in the locality.

Julian Theater.

This theater, seating 800, and built originally for a stock company, is a good example of what pictures will do as an attraction to draw crowds. It is located on Belmont Avenue, just off Clark Street, and is a handsome looking building, as the accompanying picture shows. The program offered by Manager Conderman consists of three reels of Independent pictures, and especially fine orchestra music, no vaudeville. The pictures are first-run, third-run, and a third reel about ten days old, furnished by the Anti-Trust Film Company, a service of which any theater and exchange may well be proud. Projection is excellent, and the picture, though nearly 18 feet wide, is of very good quality. Contrary to what generally happens in a house not built for the picture (and some that are) there is no drop in the throw, the level of the lens being well below the top margin of the picture.

Julian Theater, Chicago, Ill.

The music in this theater is a feature, and though it is not played to the picture, it is not so far removed from the atmosphere of the photoplay as to injure it; for instance, when the Bison film, "White Fawn's Peril," was on, the orchestra played a pleasing Indian intermezzo. Each member of the orchestra is a good soloist, and during the intermissions to change film, the player renders his or her solo in the spot light. I heard an excellent xylophone solo by the trap drummer, Mr. Shoemaker, played on one of Deagan's xylophones. Several of Deagan's instruments are in use in this house, and more will probably be added. Mr. Conderman said that he looked upon the house equipment of orchestral instruments as an asset, and did not regret spending money for them.

The patronage of the Julian reflects the character of the management, and it is not uncommon sight to see half a dozen or more automobiles lined up in front of the house while their owners are enjoying the pictures. Mr. Conderman says his Sunday patronage is over 4,000, and often nearly reaches the 5,000 mark. There is perhaps only one other picture house in Chicago which does as well as this.

The Comet Theater.

Across the street from the Julian, the Comet Theater presents a pretty good picture. Two machines are used to project the pictures, but one of them seems to be in bad condition, for a Vitagraph film projected by it was very unsteady. The service is Licensed, second run films being used.

The Chase Theater.

South of Belmont, on Clark, the Chase Theater has perhaps one of the best pictures on Clark Street in this locality. First run Independent films are used, but the second and third reels are in very poor condition. Music in this house is of a high standard, the pianist playing to the pictures pretty well with classical music almost exclusively.

Lake View Theater.

This house is just north of Belmont on Clark Street. Projection is fair, about the average, though the operator has the difficulty of old films to struggle with. The manager, Clarence L. Nelson, bids his patrons welcome from the screen at the opening of the show with a slide bearing his portrait.

Schiller's Crystal Theater.

On Clarke near Halsted is another exclusive picture house—Schiller's Crystal Theater. In fact, I noticed no vaudeville houses whatever in this neighborhood. Projection at the Crystal is not very bad, although the throw is unqualifiedly the worst one I have ever seen. It is about 25 feet for a 9 by 12 picture, and the machine is located nearly 15 feet to one side of the center of the screen. The margin of the picture shows considerable distortion, the lower edge inclined, and the left margin is concave. The definition of the moving picture is not as bad as might be expected, but the stereopticon image runs out of focus at the sides. It seems to me that the operating room ought to be located at the rear of the house. The long throw may have some disadvantages, but poor definition is not one of them. This house also uses second run Licensed service.

PICTURES OF ASHOKAN DAM.

Although the operations of New York City's Water Department known as the Ashokan Dam and Aqueduct is an undertaking greater even than the Panama Canal, from an engineering point of view, it has been strangely ignored by picturemen until now. For the past week the Kalem Company has had a camera outfit and a director on the ground getting scenes for a great industrial picture of that immense project. In New York City, at least, there will be considerable curiosity evinced in this picture, but it should command attention throughout the country, as it will portray one of the greatest engineering feats of modern times.

With the Western Producers.

By Russell Burgess.

The Selig Co. are starting on a [illegible] production which will be the best thing they have ever turned out on the [illegible]. Anything from the pen of Mr. Boggs is good, and a treat is in store for the fans who like to remember the days of the Spanish Dons when blood was hot and the rapier and money-grubbing natives had not turned their life results.

Everyone visiting the Selig studio is apt to have a lot of people tell him jokes about Sr. Tom Santchi, the guardian of the gate. He only smiles and says nothing. Why not tell the truth about him? He is the oldest actor in the state and has played with Lawrence Barrett when that grand actor was in the height of his power. John McCullough and Edwin Booth are familiar figures on his mental horizon. His greatest triumphs were achieved with Lawrence Barrett at Daly's in New York and in New Orleans. When "Francesca da Rimini," "Pendragon" and "Yorkiss Love" held the boards of the Boston Museum and the old Chambers Street Theater, the name of Edwin Green was in heavy type on the program.

Fritz Polyscope has a new suit and considers himself in John Drew's class. Out of consideration for this sartorial flash, the Selig Company has built Fritz a new house. There are bars on the windows and a clothes closet with one peg in it.

Mystery Note—Why was Dick Turpin promoted from the property room to the developing plant? Dick says it is on account of his superior brain faculties. He meant to slam the questioners, but they didn't get him.

Artistic Note—Fred Clayton wears a linen duster and flowing black tie when he works on the paint bridge. Why? Don't ask foolish questions.

Manager Boggs, of Selig's, took his headliner Tom Santchi, and went after a big oil picture on the outskirts of the city. Some benighted individual touched a match to the Hercules Oil Co.'s plant, and Mr. Boggs and the film patrons will reap the benefit while the oil company stands the cost of the staging.

Mr. Ford has played the part of the villain so many times with the Melies company that members of that company say that he is veritably beginning to feel and act the part in his ordinary life. Not so keenly has he felt the part off the stage, however, as on an occasion last week during the taking of a Melies subject entitled "A Woman's Sacrifice." Mr. Ford, in addition to playing the villain, was directing the actors in the absence of the regular director. Mr. Stanley, as the sheriff, placed handcuffs on Ford. Later, when the scene was completed, it was found that the handcuffs locked by a spring lock and that the director, then on his way to board a train for Los Angeles, had the key with him. There was not much time for thought. Ford was helped on a horse, and made a wild ride, to reach the Santa Paula station just as the train was leaving. The director was seated on the near side and in response to Ford's question answered, "What key?" Ford was almost frantic. As the train drew out, the director wrote on his newspaper and threw it out the window. Ford, believing it to contain the key, rushed eagerly, but found a note reading "On my bureau." The actor rode back, but failed to find the key.

It looked for a time as though a blacksmith would have to be called from many miles distant, when at last the key was found and Mr. Ford released, only to find that he had a duplicate key all the time in his own trousers pockets.

RECORD BREAKING PERFORMANCE BY THE LUBIN COMPANY.

When news of the terrible disaster at Austin, Pa., was flashed over the wires the Lubin Company immediately dispatched a photographer to the scene. He arrived there the following morning, but weather conditions did not permit of photographic work. On Monday and Tuesday, however, excellent views were obtained and the negative was delivered at the Lubin factory on Wednesday morning at nine a. m. Before the factory closed down for the night, prints had been shipped all over the country to the General Film Company offices and cablegrams sent to European agents soliciting their orders. Orders for 75 copies were cabled back on Thursday and these were all printed and shipped before six o'clock on Thursday. This is the fastest work that has yet been done by the Lubin Company and speaks volumes for the organization and capacity of the new plant. The film is being shown in New York as we go to press and is sharp and clear photographically and the photographer has succeeded in graphically presenting the main features of the destruction accompanying the bursting of the great dam. The film is 640 feet in length and is in such great demand that duplicate orders are still pouring in.

New Vaudette Picture Theater.

Handsome House Opened at Atlanta, Ga., by J. G. and A. C. Evins—Model Equipment Throughout.

The new Vaudette, at 74-76 Whitehall Street, Atlanta, which was opened September 4, is claimed by competent critics to be one of the best-equipped and architecturally one of the finest moving picture theaters in the country. It was built by J. G. and A. C. Evins.

The auditorium proper is 90 feet long by 40 feet wide, and 34 feet high from the floor to crown of vault. A spacious lobby flanked by two stores give access to a broad foyer opening on the auditorium. The lobby and vestibule are finished in ceramic tile, marble and mosaic. The proscenium arch of the stage is 20 feet wide by 20 feet high, opening on a stage 21 feet deep by 40 feet wide, and equipped with asbestos drop curtain, gridiron and all the mechanical apparatus of the regular theater stage. The stage draperies, scenery, etc., are from the studios of Lee Lash.

The auditorium has a seating capacity of 700 seats, as the seating is usually disposed, but in order to provide for its patrons the maximum of comfort the management has decided to place the seats 32 inches, back to back, and 22 inches apart, thus giving a seating capacity of 540. The offices are situated above the stores at each side of the operator's room, which is spacious and well ventilated, being 12 by 16 feet, cement floor, steel walls, with 24-inch exhaust, and equipped with two No. 6 Powers machines and a double stereopticon.

The theater will have eight wide exits, five in the rear and three in the front, and will be lighted by indirect lighting, not a light being visible in the whole interior. The ventilation will be by what is known as the "plenum system," forcing the air at the front and drawing it out at the back, thus insuring ideal ventilation both winter and summer. One 60-inch and two 24-inch exhausts will be used.

The front of the theater is an adaptation of the famous "Petit Palais" in Paris, which is probably the most successful design that has yet been evolved for structures of a theatrical character. The height of the entrance arch is 30 feet by a width of 20 feet. It is flanked by two colossal allegorical figures supporting the half dome above.

In the way of conveniences for patrons a ladies' rest room has been installed on the right of the inside lobby and a gentlemen's smoking room on the left.

While the Vaudette has a complete stage, the proprietors, Messrs. J. G. and A. C. Evins, have no intention of introducing vaudeville. The Vaudette program will consist of first run licensed pictures, fine singing and the best music. The Apollo Quartet was secured for the opening and the orchestra consists of five pieces.

In the operating room L. F. Henderson, chief operator and electrician, presides, assisted by two licensed operators, John Henderson and C. G. Wall. A trained staff of ushers and doormen attend to the wants of patrons. The admission prices are ten cents and five cents.

Going About Kansas City.

By Nelson T. Stephens.

I presume that if all motion picture critics were to attempt to make better pictures than those they criticize we would then have a real stuffed market. But if there were no critics, it is probable that the motion picture would be about where it was five or more years ago. In spite of the undoubted fact that the average producer assiduously attempts to ignore the alarmingly increasing mass of criticism which stares him in the face every time he lets loose of a consignment of films—in spite of all this his pictures improve—and for no other reason than the fact that said criticisms slowly but surely permeate his own ideas and those of his working force. Here's a question: What more good could come to the producer himself and his products than the "naming of names?" There seems to be altogether too much hesitancy with critics in coming out flat-footedly and naming in practically every case the maker criticized. When such general faults as bad photography, bum actors, poor stage management or "rum" stories are to be laid at a maker's door, why not name the gentleman? Just because he puts out occasionally a near-faultless picture is no reason his name should be witheld. If we criticize, let's do the thing up right. The motion picture hasn't too many good critics—the more the better. The critic shouldn't be asked to make one just as good—this is not a parallel case of the old clergyman's telling the young man who scoffed at the magnificence of the Psalms to "make a few." It's a rare dramatic critic who could write a play as good as the worst he criticizes.

The other evening—Sunday—I dropped into five or six of Kansas City's downtown theaters. I first tackled the Tenth Street Theater, a really handsome house using first run Licensed. A "rough-house" Gaumont was on the screen. Perhaps the operator had gone to sleep—perhaps the machine motor had a hot box—I don't know, but I do know that it was ludicrous the way the actors crawled over the screen. You'd have thought it was a funeral procession instead of a fox hunt. I was next treated to a Pathe American Revolution story which took eighteen and a half minutes to run—according to my Elgin. The picture was murdered by slow running and impossible music. The piano player, with a distant look, drummed out national airs to the picture until I thought I'd go crazy. I arose and walked out, unable to stomach the other reel and a half of the show. There you are—Sunday evening crowd—handsome house—well lighted picture—all spoiled because of incompetent music and poorly run pictures. Two weeks before I was in the Tenth Street and a fine Pathe was ruined because of excessive speed, all because it happened to be ten-thirty p. m., and the operator wanted to keep his eleven o'clock date, in all probability. Poor operators and worse pianists never did anything for any picture show except to kill trade.

I paid my next admission at Yale's Twelfth Street theater, the Lyric, I believe. Here the projection was excellent in every way. Accompanied by an automatic organ of some kind playing stale tunes, Kalem's "Day and Night"—a poor picture at best—failed to draw either a snicker or a sympathetic expression, so far as I could ascertain. When Edison's "Then You'll Remember Me" was thrown on the screen, the raucous-toned impossibility was suppressed and a pianist assumed control; but he just played—he did not interpret the picture. By the way, when is that old loss-of-memory gag going to be stopped in pictures? Actually, if I've seen one picture with that theme in the past two years, I've seen a dozen. The only thing that saved this picture for me was the strong finish—a really commendable piece of acting and stage arrangement.

At the Princess, an Independent house, I witnessed a Reliance projected in an intelligent manner with a Powers Six and a plain cloth curtain. I am unable to recall or find the name of the picture, but is a fair example of Reliance's productions. Henry Walthall, who took the lead, is always dependable; he has saved many a picture from oblivion. The violin and piano accompaniment to this picture was fair. Expressions from those about me indicated that the picture and music were being enjoyed.

At the Subway, on Eighth and Walnut, I was ushered to my seat by a nice looking young woman. A trap drummer in this place managed to remain subdued during Kalem's "Little Cripple." But during a following Gaumont and Lubin this gentleman managed also to come to, and his interpretation of horses' hoofs, etc., was really enlightening. For a whole flock of cowboys, his little tickety-tick-tick was entrancing. Oh, why did the Lord perpetrate trap drummers upon the motion picture! Projection in this theater is fair—the operator is not quite careful enough with his light, for several times I saw yellow and blue in the picture. This is perhaps one of the busiest theaters in the city, being on an excellent corner.

The Palace, on Main Street, has seats and curtain arranged vice versa to the usual plan. It is a handsomely decorated house and does a fine business; has good music—a piano and violin—but has either a bad machine or a poor operator. The pictures, Biograph's "Diving Girl," a Pathe Indian, and Kalem's "Wasp" were mercilessly butchered, all because they were run too fast and because they were jumpy at the same time. I am told the machine is an old worn-out Motiograph—maybe, but I think even with that I could put on a better picture than the Palace operator treated us to. Decent speed, new sprockets, and star and cam would work wonders for projection in the Palace. The operator did keep a good, white light.

At Rose's Lyric, on Seventh and Main, a sign bids the passerby to enter and listen to the 25-piece orchestral musical instrument within. I obeyed and heard it through Eclipse's "Taming of the Shrew," a split reel Edison comedy; "The Unfinished Letter" and "Money to Burn," two very amusing little pieces, and Selig's "Saved by the Pony Express." Assuredly a good program—and the Wurlitzer (the name of the instrument, I believe) did very creditable work in accompaniment. Fortunately, the manager of the place had good judgment to turn the instrument off onto a different vein when the picture demanded. Tho' it was very near eleven o'clock p. m. when this show was out, the operator did not rush matters and he held a very good light.

On the whole, enthusiasm for pictures has not waned in Kansas City in spite of the fact that in no one of the downtown theaters I visited did I find my ideal. But the average picture patron hasn't such fastidious ideals as I have, I presume. The nearest to my ideal that I know of in these parts is right here in Lawrence. Its name is the Aurora, managed by Mr. N. H. Gibbons. With a Mirror Screen, a Powers No. 6, a Mercury Arc Rectifier, good projection and remarkably fine piano music, Mr. Gibbons has a show that absolutely stands for no criticism. In his house, Licensed, a picture is sympathetically interpreted—it is not simply "showed."

The other day I saw a Vitagraph which had for its theme the love of a man for a Vestal Virgin—"The Fires of Fate." And do you know that on the sub-title we received the intelligence that "Calchas (I believe the name was) was the sweetheart of his boyhood days." They were words to that effect, anyway. Now how hard could Calchas have loved her when she entered the nunnery, or rather, the College of Vestals, somewhere between the ages of six and ten? In Rome, no girl entered the college after the latter age. Again, I wonder if the producing manager of Vitagraph has any idea of the architecture of the Temple of Vesta. Oh, well, what's the difference?—it's a cinch none of the public has. Do the Vitagraph people know that Vestal Virgins had shaved heads and wore no such garment as this picture depicted? Does the Vitagraph director know that Imperial guards would be on hand for such a disturbance as depicted, and not trust the handling of prisoners to the mob? And that no man was allowed within the Temple of Vesta, not even the mob after the outrage? And what a silly ending this picture had! As if [illegible] possible from a human dungeon hollowed out of rock six feet underground. The very fact that there are people among picture patrons over the country who have intelligence slightly in advance of that of the ordinary run of people is argument enough for the admonition to picture makers that they first acquaint themselves with every historic detail connected with a story before producing it, and thus avoid such gross blunders as the Vitagraph made in the picture mentioned. There are some other recent pictures which I might pick out, but I refrain for the present.

WANTS PROTECTION FOR SCENARIO WRITERS.

By Leonard L. Hess.

I shall begin by the statement of a grievance, lodged against some of the most prominent film-producing companies; this grievance, since it has so often been discussed in the Moving Picture World, I shall state briefly: it is the immoderate length of time which these said companies take before returning rejected manuscripts; I use the term immoderate, because there is no conceivable reason for this conduct on their parts. The editorial staffs of prominent magazines are more burdened with manuscripts than are the editorial staffs of film companies, and in no instance have I known a magazine to keep a manuscript as long as do these companies.

I wish now to mention a personal experience, which is an expansion of the above complaint. I sent two scenarios for consideration to a film company. Within a few days one of the scenarios, accompanied by a neat rejection-slip was shoved under my door by the postman; also there was a note to the effect that the other scenario was being reconsidered. The process of reconsideration occupied time fully sufficient to stage, act and fully prepare for production, the scenario, which was then returned, honored not even by a rejection-slip. I ask whether this conduct is not censurable. To me it appears so to the last degree, and I do not hesitate to proclaim my belief that the scenario was kept by the company with no other end in view, except that of filching.

Despite the opinions voiced in an article published in your magazine some months ago, declaring that no copyright was necessary for the protection of scenarios; that the editors of the film companies are honorable; that manuscripts are sent unprotected to magazines; and finally that it constitutes an insult to the editors of the film companies to send them manuscripts so protected, I say that such protection is absolutely imperative; and I deplore the extent to which the submittor of scenarios is left entirely at the mercy of the companies to which he submits them, the tactics of which may be often highly unscrupulous. I do not consider the honor of the film companies as great as that of the magazines, nor even the integrity of their respective heads to be on a par. I believe that a letter to you, published in the recent issue of September 2, fully confirms my convictions in these respects.

Some action ought to be speedily taken to prevent the future long-retaining of scenarios, and also for the better protection of the scenario writer's property; I believe that through the medium of your pages this can be accomplished.

A well-known motion picture studio director was asked the other day what he thought was the most sought and the most difficult to find in connection with the making of the pictures and he replied, "Good, wholesome, original ideas. We receive many scenarios of merit, but they lack originality. It is the sameness we have great difficulty in keeping away from. It does not surprise me. Think of the number of pictures that are produced annually. One company is now turning out 312 and another 260, and others, almost innumerable, are producing 100 to 200 each year."

Working the Sound Effects

BY CLYDE MARTIN

ONE of the most important and useful effects that will be found in the average drummer's collection of traps is the "baby cry" imitation, and still there are many drummers in the business that do not seem to appreciate the usefulness of this little effect when handled in the proper manner.

Some drummers are inclined to believe that every time a baby appears in one of the pictures they are supposed to get busy with the baby cry imitation. This is a sad mistake that is made by many.

To my notion, the "baby cry" imitation should be used in very few dramatic pictures unless there is a vein of comedy mingled with the dramatic scenes. During the showing of a purely dramatic production, the use of the "baby cry" is entirely out of place, as it only has the tendency to burlesque the scene portrayed and sets the audience laughing, which spoils the theme of the story and makes the audience lose interest.

As an illustration to my argument, I will use the Kalem release of August 23rd as an example. In this picture, "Don Ramon's Daughter," there is an important scene that shows the mother and her small baby arriving at the monastery where the child is to be cared for. It is a pathetic scene, a parting of mother and child. The use of a "baby cry" imitation would be entirely out of keeping with the seriousness of the scene and would be out of place, notwithstanding the fact that the child is crying all through the action of this scene. On the other hand, where you have a chance to work the crying effect in a comedy picture, never let the scene get by you, as it only helps the intentions of the producer along. It is a good idea to never work the baby cry even in a comedy picture unless the audience can plainly see that the child is crying.

Not long ago I had the pleasure of playing for the Essanay picture called "Summer Babies." It was a short educational subject on the same reel with "Gossiping Yapville," the Essanay release of August 22nd. In the closing scene of this baby picture it shows a group of babies in a very discontented mood; in fact, the majority of them were crying. On this occasion I cut out the effect for the simple reason that the drummer had but one "baby cry" imitation in his collection, and the use of one imitation would have been far from realistic, considering the fact that several babies were shown crying. In such a scene as this, five or six "baby cry" imitations should have been used in order to get the desired effect. Don't do things half way. If you cannot put on an effect in a realistic manner, it is better to cut it out entirely.

Another picture of recent date in which the "baby cry" came in to good advantage, was the Edison release of August 9th, a seven hundred foot comedy with a crying baby as the center of attraction. If you have not as yet run this comedy, be on the lookout for it, as it is out of the ordinary and gives the effect man several opportunities to get in some good work.

The "horse hoof" imitation is another effect that is used with little discretion by many of the drummers over the country. The "horse hoof" imitation is one of the first effects that the average drummer will secure in making up his collection of traps. Most all effect men and drummers use "horse hoofs" on a marble slab, which is very good indeed when the scene shows the horses running or walking on a brick or stone pavement, but great care should be used when the horses are shown running on the grass or even a country road, which is usually the case in most Western and riding pictures. One of the best ideas I have found in use where the horses are shown running on the grass is to use the imitation on a leather cushion or a padded board, thus giving it a muffled effect.

From this, some people may be inclined to think I am trying to get the working of such effects down to a fine point, which I am undoubtedly trying to do, and you will find that I am right. The picture fans of to-day are critical and they will comment on your effects the same as they do the music. There are many people in your audience that delight in looking for the mistakes; they watch for flaws in the pictures; they watch the piano player to see if he will play anything through a death scene, and you should bear in mind that they are watching the work of the drummers and effect man. If they were not, the manager would have little use for one. The piano player can easily smooth over a little mistake, but the effect man never can.

In a great many of the picture theaters that I have visited I have found that they have been working the electric doorbell overtime. It seems to be the general opinion that the common electric bell will take the place of everything, from a telephone bell to the bell on an electric runabout. You wouldn't think of using a cowbell for a cathedral chime. Why then should you use a little doorbell for a telephone bell? There is certainly as much difference.

There is hardly a program in your theater that does not call for a telephone bell and it is just as cheap in the long run to give them the real article. It is a very easy matter to pick up a junk phone from your local telephone company and the difference in the effect will soon show a marked improvement. At Louisville, Kentucky, I found a drummer that had mounted all of his different bells and gongs on a large board. Most of them were operated by batteries and he had a keyboard of push-buttons arranged in such a manner that he had no difficulty in working them. The board arrangement is very simple and inexpensive and would prove a valuable addition to any effect outfit.

I have, in the past few days, received a number of inquiries as to what effects are the most essential in making up a list for a picture theater. I will print this list and trust it will prove what the correspondents desire:

Railroad imitation, railroad bell, air brake, street car gong, fire gong, auto horn, electric doorbell, telephone bell, small table bell, small hand bell, cathedral chimes, wind whistle, canary whistle, cow bawl, steamboat whistle, locomotive whistle, rifleshot cushion, surf and steam or sand blocks, horse hoofs, slap stick, police rattle, sleigh bells, tambourine, castanets, thunder sheet, hen cackle, duck quack, rooster crow, baby cry, tom-tom, large Chinese cymbal, Chinese musette, wood block, cowbell, anvil, auto chug-chug, wind machine, crash box.

There are some of the above listed effects that you will find little use for; still, it is best to have them on hand, for you will find that, when the opportunity does come to use them, they will be greatly appreciated by the audience. Then, again, you will find many traps listed above that can be made by the effect men, but it always pays to have the best so you will find that it is better to buy them from some good firm where you are getting the advantage of its years of experience.

The railroad imitation made by every manufacturer is the steam engine effect, and this same imitation can be used in pictures where dredges, steam shovels, etc., are at work, with the correct effect. When the train is shown pulling into the station the audience hears the engine, the whistle, the locomotive bell, etc., but when you go into the detail of letting them hear the whistle of the air brake, you have won a point, and a good one.

I recently found a very good detail in working a telephone bell. If the scene shows an office or a dwelling and the telephone is calling someone, it is a very good idea to keep the bell ringing until the party takes down the receiver from the hook. This is just another one of my "crank" details, but it is good. Try it the next time.

The Chinese musette that is mentioned in the list is one of the traps that you will find very little occasion to use; still it should be included in the collection. The Vitagraph Company recently released a comedy picture called "Queer Folks," and in his picture it shows the bally-hoo of a side-show with the oriental snake charmer doing a few stunts on the platform in front of the tent. The effect of the Chinese musette in this scene alone would justify anyone in buying one of these horns. Then they come in to good advantage in Chinese or in any oriental scenic pictures. In some of the scenic pictures it is hard to supply the music, let alone the sound effects. But in any of the celestial scenics a musette would make the hit of the evening.

The United States Government is now using the cinematograph in a large way. To give details would be to catalogue the various departments of the government, for all are now adopting the picture as a means of educating those within its various departments, as also for the purpose of enlightening those who are without—the general public.

It is officially stated that the problem of educating the public to the work being done by its own government was carefully considered by the President and the members of his cabinet before authority was given to proceed in the larger methods now adopted.

The government of the City of New York is this month holding its annual budget display, which is one of the most advanced methods of enlightening the public on civic affairs, but with the addition of the pictures convert the exhibition into a school to which not only knowledge-seeking citizens go but where high school scholars may go to get at first hand practical lessons in civil government.

In state affairs also it will soon be a rare thing for any department to be without its picture displays, the result being that more perfect knowledge of their possibilities is provoking greater efficiency and economy in every way, besides enlightening the public in a most interesting, even an entertaining, manner concerning the detail workings of their own affairs. Conventions and congresses, with their long talks and prolonged sessions, will be largely curtailed, yet with greater directness and precision together with more practical results.

EDUCATION WITHOUT BOOKS.

An astonishing advance due to the introduction of the picture method of teaching is an increasing elimination of books and the use of practical methods. Books are theoretical, and as such are giving way to the practical; only so far as their explanatory uses are required do they retain much of their old value.

The otherwise dead museums are also being quickened into life under the rapidly developing new order of things. The combination of the living illustration in the picture and the specimens in the museums are starting new courses of lectures in such important centers as the Natural History Museum in New York and in the Brooklyn Institute. Whatever is done in these important places is also followed up in all large cities similarly well equipped.

The large numbers of teachers and others interested in educational work who are attending these new courses is sufficient proof of their great value. In colleges, too, similar methods are being adopted in all possible practical work. It is no uncommon thing now for these halls of learning to have their own farms and other industrial plants; these are not merely experimental but practical and profitable, because if not profitable their whole object fails. The cities are the market places for all kinds of products for educational institutions, although purchasers and users may be ignorant of the fact.

This is again but the beginning of another of the large and numerous class of opportunities and possibilities which the moving picture has opened up; where is it going to stop? There is no stopping place! A continuous chronology of events will be the duty of this page, for the field of venture is as wide as the universe.

Child acting is always attractive, not the occasional prodigy but the usual necessary addition to the portrayal of life upon the stage, which belongs alone and especially to childhood. In the old theater the great labor attached to nightly appearances of the young actors became a hardship so that in the commoner phases of child acting the law was compelled to adjudge the same as belonging to that class of child labor which became a cruelty. Happily the cinematograph has removed this difficulty and all other barriers, giving us the child actor in all naturalness, simplicity and thoroughness. The educational value of acting to the child, with its many histrionic accomplishments may be easily comprehended; further, the fact that but a few portrayals before the camera are necessary and all sufficient for public presentation, all labor and other attendant hardships are removed.

A consequent result of this is the helpfulness to the children who see the pictures; it has been with great interest that the writer has listened to children's comments upon the "children in the picture" and it is a pleasure to recall that all have been helpful.

While there is nothing of the "stage-struck" desire to emulate, there is often a well defined idea of the correct or incorrect, the natural or the strained; for indeed children are the keenest and best judges of children. Out of this spirit there grows an educational advantage, not in rhetoric but in action, emphasis, deportment and comprehensive personality.

Several of the film manufacturers have been happy in the children secured for their scenes, even of an age younger than would be possible upon the stage. Of these it can be said that the natural innocence they showed immediately won the hearts of all who saw them.

Even as the automobile has removed the fear and cruelty of overdriving the horse, so the cinematograph has removed all fear of abusing the child, thereby giving us the great freedom of securing and enjoying the true portrayal of life in one of its most interesting stages in a manner hitherto impossible.

No child actor, prodigy or genius could possibly be found to give the extremely juvenile productions now enjoyed; and apart from the pleasure given by these young actors, they are unconscious teachers of both young and old in many ways, imparting a value not anticipated before.

It has been wondered how early in life the moving picture may be proved valuable to children in school; the opinion of those interested in the child actor is that as soon as children can intelligently discern anything they begin to learn, and therefore the cinematograph will meet them on the very threshhold of life's knowledge.

A STRANGE MISUSE OF THE PICTURE.

A minister has recently been boasting of two things: first, his progressiveness; he has installed a picture machine in his church for evening services; second, his success; he is drawing the crowds. This man is entirely wrong, and it is easy to predict that before long not only will the crowds be gone but also the church; and a minister who will not be looking for a pastorate, but for a job.

The right use of the moving picture in the church is as an illustrative aid, an auxiliary to religion and not a substitute therefor. People are wise; their united opinion is good; they know the difference between true religion and a picture show, and even the most hardened or indifferent are true enough to believe religion should not be adulterated with an exhibition. Any religion or any church which needs the help of even legitimate worldly attractions to sustain its Sabbath services, had better consider the necessity of discontinuing.

For helping in social, educational or even indirectly in inspirational work, by the uses of Biblical illustrations, each rightly timed and placed, the moving picture has a valuable mission field in the church instructional work of to-day. In wise hands it can be made a power for good and indeed is rapidly becoming so, but let it not be forgotten that a blessing perverted becomes a curse, and it is even possible for a minister in blind enthusiasm to go wild. Keep the valuable aids in their place, and they increase in value and prove a blessing.

It is reported from London that an English syndicate has completed negotiations with the Chinese government for the establishment of a circuit of motion picture theaters in the large cities of China. The houses will be financed by the local mandarins and will be operated by Chinese. The syndicate is granted the right to take films of any part of the Chinese Empire.

Projection Department

Edited by F. H. RICHARDSON

A Few Questions.—Georgia (name of town suppressed) writes: "When my 110 volt gasoline engine driven generator outfit broke down on me a few days ago, I bought power from a neighbor who has a 220 volt outfit. I changed my incandescent lamps to 220 volts, hooked up the fans in series, connected up my 25 ampere adjustable Power rheostat in series with 150 feet of hay bale wire resistance, and projected as good a picture as before. This extra resistance was made by nailing insulation knobs 4 inches apart, and running back and forth to another line of knobs some 20 inches away. There is very little heat to it. All is D. C. Where I was getting 45 volts at the arc with my own power, I am now getting 52. Friend Montgomery is right about love sick dramas; while they are not as vicious as the old, cheap melodrama, they are very wearying, and might profitably be replaced with pictures of travel, industrial films, etc. What do you have to do to join the I. A. T. S. E., besides having the price and being a decent citizen? If there is a vertical jump in the picture, and you know your star and cam shafts to be parallel, where do you look for trouble? Where do the photoplay actors get their funny wigs and whiskers? Did you ever see a real live human being with a beard like the old man in Khmara, in Making Mother Over, and the laughing miner at the end of the Tenderfoot's Claim? Can't they do better? I marked a coin and put it in circulation at the box office, advertising freely and offering a $5.00 reward for its return on a certain night. Everybody was talking about it, and some 50 coins were brought in. It worked well. Hope brother managers can use the scheme. What percentage of light is reflected from an aluminum coated curtain, and what from white plain news print paper? What is a good scheme to fill the house in the afternoon in a small town—5,000? Am glad to say that after reading your valuable handbook, I have the best projection for 30 miles around, but there will be another house opened in a few days, so I cannot predict later results. Can I get any information about the use of storage batteries, cost, etc.? Do the exchanges give as close care to the condition of the reel as they should? Many thanks for the enjoyment I get out of reading your section of the Moving Picture World."

Am surprised to learn that you are able to pull 52 amperes over ordinary iron baling wire "without much heat." It is far above its capacity. To join the I. A. T. S. E. you must be a practical operator and (I have just been told) a resident of the city in which you join, except where a union has been given jurisdiction over other territory. You might write Mr. John McMillian, secretary L. U. 41, Box 267, Atlanta, Ga., for information. It depends on what kind of a jump the picture has. If it jumps up and down four times to each turn of the crank it means the intermittent sprocket is not true or its shaft is sprung. If it is in quick short jerks probably your tension springs bear too lightly or your sprocket teeth are badly worn. As to the wigs and whiskers, you are at liberty to search me. Don't know whether or not they can do better, but do know some of them couldn't do much worse. The marked coin stunt is passed along to our readers for experiment. Plain white plaster reflects about 82 per cent. of the light. An ordinary commercial mirror reflects about 87 per cent. I have no figures on aluminum. It would depend considerably on the surface. We would be very glad to have the department readers suggest schemes for "filling the house afternoons." Would suggest you look up books on use of storage batteries in your public library. You might also write (enclosing stamp) the Thomas A. Edison Company, Orange, N. J. Very likely they could give you a lot of information, or tell you where to get it. S-h-h-h. It's a secret! No, exchanges don't give reels as close care and attention as they should. S-h-h-h! Keep it dark. Glad you like the handbook and department.

Norfolk Comes Back.—Norfolk, Va., writes: "I notice under heading 'An Argument,' page 885, September 23 issue, a criticism of my former letter and sketch; also one from Galveston, both of which I will answer; also your own comments on their arguments. Taking Leadville first: It is not clear to him what I meant by 'machine.' Not having copy of my original letter I will begin at the beginning of the matter. If my memory serves me correctly I said nothing to offend anyone. What I wrote was written with a good will and for what I believed to be the interest of the department in general. I answered Leadville's argument by backing up his claim that it was impossible to maintain a projection arc without other resistance than that peculiar to the arc itself. When I said that he probably did not know how the result was produced, I meant that he, as well as others may have been doing the same thing and were too modest to come forward and say so for fear they might be contradicted and not be able to explain how it is done, though they were actually doing it. Leadville said it could be done. You said such a thing was an impossibility, hence my letter and the present argument, which I am pleased to see. You remember I said it would wake up somebody who was from 'Missouri' and would have to be shown.

"By 'machine' I meant my motor-generator set and not the lamp. I thought I made my sketch plain enough, but now see where I made one error, not in the drawing, for that is absolutely correct, but in not stating that the motor and generator armatures are both mounted on one shaft, but entirely separate from each other; consequently both must revolve at exactly the same speed. I did not think it necessary to set this fact forth as such sets are usually on one shaft. Now, Leadville, study the connections again and you will see that I have a compound wound motor, driving a shunt wound generator, with a practically permanent field. So far as concerns the compounding of the motor, tapping the brush leads of the generator on one side and the 230 volt lead on the other, if you will study that connection carefully you will find that if the operator should freeze his carbons—that is, keep them together when in the act of striking his arc—it would have a tendency to strengthen the compounding of the motor, thereby preventing it from racing and holding its speed constant. Study the shunt winding of both motor and generator fields. You will see that they are connected in series with each other and that the closed circuit rheostat is in series with it for regulating the strength of the field. The less field resistance you have in circuit the more current you can get from a generator, and vice versa. Don't overlook the fact, however, that the armature of the generator being on the same shaft with the motor, both must travel, or revolve at the same speed, and that speed is controlled by the field rheostat, which in turn controls both motor and generator fields. I think this will, or ought to, make matters clear to Leadville.

"And now, Friend Richardson, here goes for yourself! You say you expected I would be jumped on by somebody because I called my set a 'Compensarc.' Well, that is exactly what it is, according to what the makers claim on the name plate. For further information write the Ft. Wayne Electric Company, its builders. They call it a 'Compensarc,' in large, plain letters and when I said a 'Compensarc,' or what is better known to the electrical fraternity as a booster set, or balancing set, I meant exactly what I said. There are lots of electrical appliances called by names entirely foreign to what they really are. Nevertheless we have to accept their makers' designation, under which they are marketed, so as to be understood. But that is not the point. Leadville said he could produce and maintain an arc without resistance other than that natural to the arc. You disputed this proposition and still do so in the issue of September 23. I must again correct you. It can, and is being done every day. If you doubt it come down to Norfolk and if you are from Missouri I will show you! If I don't I will pay your expenses. In your answer to Leadville you say: as near as you can understand I have a compensarc hitched in between the motor and generator and that would not put it on D. C. Look at that sketch again. Nowhere does it say A. C. It is entirely D. C. Also you say you never heard of a connection between the brushes of a motor and generator. Well, you hear of it now. There are many things we don't hear of until we actually see them and then we are surprised. Of course it is reasonable to suppose you are on the same side of the fence with Leadville, inasmuch as I failed to mention the fact that both armatures are on one shaft. A little thing like that makes all the difference in the world. There is one thing only in your answer to Leadville I don't like, viz.: you say the sketch is O. K. and then, when its correctness is disputed, tell us you don't always say what you think about such matters. You also say that you hope I won't become angry. Allow me to say that nothing is further from my thoughts. I am more than pleased at the argument brought forth because some of us will learn. But let me tell you one thing, in the most friendly spirit: don't say what you don't think of some things sent in to you for explanation. Either put it up to us for an example for your readers to study on, give your candid opinion, be it right or wrong, or else say nothing at all. I perfectly realize the fact that you are asked questions regarding which make of appliance is best which you cannot, for obvious reasons, answer. But in discussion like the present give your candid opinion and any one with a thimble full of sense will take it the right way and not get angry, because through such discussion we all learn. I trust you, Leadville, are not angry for I meant nothing personal. Far from it! I still say you are right regarding the arc matter. Will be pleased to discuss this matter privately with you if you wish. Letter addressed Manager Arcade Theater will reach me and be promptly answered. This answer, as a whole, ought to satisfy Galveston. If not, will have to come across with further explanations. All this is with best of feeling to all. I sincerely trust it will be thus accepted."

Well, Norfolk, I've taken my verbal spanking like a little man. It is no easy task to edit a department of this kind as you would soon discover were you the man behind the typewriter for a while. I have done what seemed to be best. Doubtless I have made mistakes. Most of us do at times. As to the compensarc: the Ft. Wayne Co. put out a low voltage auto-transformer called a "Compensarc" and sold a lot of them. Just why they would have two different appliances of entirely different nature both sailing under the same name I don't know. That they have is news to me, and I shall write them concerning it. As to the connections, I am not deeply enough versed in the effect of various machine field and armature windings to speak with entire confidence. I therefore think I shall leave you fellows to scrap it out. If, however, it comes to a case of locked horns—meaning that both claim to be right and neither willing to give way, I have advantage of advice from one of the best electrical engineers in New York City. His word I would consider as law. My idea in O. K.-ing things I did not actually believe to be right has been simply this: I want discussion and argument, since that adds interest. It is a queer fact that many men who will sit silent as an owl under almost any circumstances—who will seemingly even go to a lot of trouble to hide their really excellent fund of knowledge lest others learn from them, will jump into the middle of an argument and come forward with their learning the instant they think they see an opportunity to call some one down, particularly if that some one happen to be considered somewhat of an authority. By taking the course I have I fully expected to crack the shell of some supposed-to-be burglar-proof knowledge box. This arc-without-resistance question is of much importance and I think might better be threshed out in the department rather than privately.

"Spurious Parts.—McCook, Neb., writes: "I notice your article under the heading An Imposition and a Swindle. Yes, there are several parties making and selling imitation parts for the leading projecting machines, which I think is an imposition on the manufacturers of the machines. They all claim that their machines are fully covered by patents. Why don't they stop these imitators from making these fake parts? Another thing I want to ask is this: Who was it that created a market for these crude, cheap imitations? It's some of the exhibitors that demand such cheap junk, I say some because they are not all that way, but only about half, and that is what brought about this miserable condition. If the exhibitors wouldn't demand such worthless trash the makers of same would soon be forced out of business. You say that these parts are built cheaply for the purpose of catching suckers—yes, and the exhibitor is right there grabbing up the junk and considers it a bargain just because he can buy it at cut rates. Some don't know the difference and others don't care, just so the parts are cheap. You would be surprised if you could see some of the letters from exhibitors asking for the very cheapest work and parts to be had, and when you give them a legitimate price for genuine parts they say, 'Why, I can get that for just half in Chicago and get improved parts at that.' Whenever they buy Edison or Power's parts at half price I can assure them that they are buying crude, cheap imitations which are practically worthless and a detriment to the exhibitor and the business in general."

Comment on the foregoing seems almost unnecessary, except to say that its writer is a dealer in machines and supplies and knows whereof he speaks. Exhibitors who seek to save a few cents, or even a few dollars, on cheap, miserably made machine parts are, as I have said before, not only assisting in what amounts to a swindle, but they are literally saving five cents at the expense of a dollar. The genuine article not only lasts much longer, but gives better service as well. It is almost unbelievable that men claiming to be theater managers will pursue such a short-sighted policy and be penurious enough to demand inferior goods to save a few measley cents or dollars. Yet I know, without McCook's assurance, that a surprising number of them do.

Condenser "Explodes."—Marion, Ill., writes: "I attach clipping from one of our daily papers concerning a small operating room blaze in one of our theaters. The operator was trying out the films before the show. One of the condensing lenses cracked and he moved the lamphouse over, but it stuck before the light was off the film and the latter blazed up at the aperture. In jerking the reel away he flipped a piece of the burning film into a box containing other reels, setting them all aflame. Aside from loss of the films the damage was not over $25. What do you think of the article? I suppose you never had the pleasure of seeing a condensing lens explode. I derive much benefit from the department and your answers to correspondents. Have made a scrapbook of them for reference."

The article referred to shows the usual stupid ignorance of the newspaper reporter who knows nothing of his subject and cares far more for sensation than for facts. He rings in the impossible stock "explosion," only this time he intimates that the condenser exploded instead of the film. "The flames from the condenser shot back to the films," says this cheerful idiot, neither knowing or probably caring that his statement displayed almost childish ignorance. "The firemen subdued the flames before the place was gutted." "Had the explosion occurred while a show was in progress there is hardly a doubt but that lives would have been lost." Thus the article runs, every possible thing magnified in the insane desire for sensation. It is small use to try to stem such outrage and prevent the writing of such blatant nonsense. The daily paper must have sensation to swell sales and it cares little or nothing who is unjustly injured in the process of its money making. It may be noted that had an automatic fire shutter been attached to that machine there would have been no fire at all. Also had the reels been in a covered metal box it would not have been nearly so bad.

Address Wanted.—Will party writing letter published "Sensible Letter," page 621, September 2 issue, send address. Have letter for him, but have lost his address.

Wage Scale.—Editor Projection Department Moving Picture World. Dear Sir and Brother: The Moving Picture Operators' Union, Auxiliary of Local 35, I. A. T. S. E., New York City, has adopted the following scale of wages:

Matinee and evenings (1 hour for supper)	$22.00 per week
Evenings only	18.00 per week
Evenings and Saturday and Sunday Mat.	19.50 per week
Double shift, 12 noon to 11 p. m.	18.00 each man
Double shift, 1 noon to 11 p. m.	18.00 each man
Double shift, 9 a. m. to 12 p. m.	21.00 each man
One shift, two men, 12 noon to 11 p. m. and one hour for supper for each man.	25.00 each man

Relief work at rate of one day's pay, the minimum rate to be paid $3.00 per day.
Relief for supper, 75 cents per hour.
No changing of reels by operators, unless they have commutation tickets.
This schedule to go into effect on November 1, 1911.

Attest: WILLIAM F. McVEY,
Recording Secretary.

Trouble Galore.—Youngstown, O., writes: "Have been a World reader for six months and it is wonderful how clearly you explain things. I am using an Edison machine, 250 volt, 60 cycle A. C., using 75 amperes. There seems to be a blue spot in center and at edges of picture. I have put new bushings on my intermittent sprocket shaft. Before I did this the sprocket holes showed on one side: now they show on both sides and it certainly has got my goat. Have been three years in the business and never saw anything like this. Recently the manager came up and said my picture did not look right. Do you think there is really something wrong? Sometimes I have to take both hands to turn the crank. Do you think my shutter is a little out? When upper feed sprocket slides what is the cause? For the benefit of those who do not know, 3-in-1 oil is good to clean Edison lenses."

Either you are trying to have some fun with me or—well, I will assume that your rather surprising queries are in good faith, though I've several doubts. Inasmuch as you have failed to give me width of picture and length of throw,

I cannot give positive advice as to the blue ghost. Try moving lamphouse back and forward. If sprocket holes show on both sides there is something wrong with your aperture plate. It has been filed out and is too wide. Get a new one. Yes, there decidedly is something wrong and if you are cleaning your lenses with 3-in-1 oil, or any other kind of oil, wash them off with wood alcohol at once, polishing afterwards with a very clean, very soft cloth. If you have to "take both hands to run the machine," you had better get busy. Probably your star is binding on the cam. Try slacking the star off a little. You ask if I "think your shutter is a little out?" If there are streaks up and down from letters in titles, it is; not otherwise. If you are really using 75 amperes you should have ¼-inch carbons. You will have to explain what you mean "when the upper feed sprocket slides."

Union Wanted.—Indiana (name of town suppressed) writes: "What are requirements for an operator to join the I. A. T. S. E.? What qualifications are necessary? Have owned, managed and operated for more than four years, but sold out a short time since. Where is nearest union?"

The only requirement is that a man be a practical motion picture operator actively engaged in operating and, I believe, a resident of the city or town where he joins. Most unions examine applicants to determine their knowledge of projection and what goes with it. There is an operators' union in Indianapolis, Ind., of which Jno. J. Cook, 137 N. Illinois St., Indianapolis, is secretary. You might write him for further information.

From Boston.—Boston, Mass., writes: "You were right in supposing the rheostat mentioned in my last letter to be a 220-volt one. It proved to be a 220-volt resistance split to accommodate two lamps on 110. I enclose two sketches, one showing how to make a cheap, practical arc projector. Use one of the lenses of an old eyeglass and mount as shown. If the lens is used without the metal eyeglass rim, use leather washers in clamping the same between washers on screw in end of slide-rod. I have also shown a simple and practical way of lessening danger of condenser breakage when the round metal mount is used. The large ring is more or less of a nuisance, being often both difficult to get

If the lens is a tight fit never force it in unless you wish to invite quick breakage. Any dentist will allow you to use his emery wheel to grind off the lens edge until it is loose in the mount. I have added many things to my store of knowledge through reading the Department, and anything I can contribute (right or wrong, for I wish to be corrected if wrong) will be a pleasure."

A coarse grindstone [illegible] to a [illegible] like to [illegible] better than an [illegible] edge. As [illegible] for the excellent drawings. [illegible] the Department, although the knowledge and help of others from all over the world, may fall to the share of [illegible] by contributing. I want to say again that providing the writing be legible the fear of not being able to write for publication need hinder no one. Just get your ideas set forth and I will fix it up on the printer. Not one letter in a dozen goes to the printer exactly as it was written, but I never change the ideas expressed in any degree; only the wording. Many letters are very crude; so much so that it is sometimes hard work to decipher their real meaning. Still we must thank the writer, for he has at least done his duty as well as he could. I take great pains with such letters, re-writing and smoothing them up for the printer man. Once in a while I misunderstand the meaning myself and then I hear from the outraged correspondent.

Atlanta, Ga., writes: "Probably if Miami, Fla., and McPherson, Kas., will get the right adjustment on the lower sprocket idlers and the right tension on their takeups, they won't have to substitute an out-of-date roller for the steel one on the latest machines. It always worked for me and I have the first time to be obliged to substitute parts of an old model machine for the new."

There was more to this letter, but it was in the nature of comments which would merely have hurt someone's feelings without doing any good at all. We are glad to hear from readers, but this department is not for personal comments.

Edison Gate.—Baltimore, Md., writes: "Will you kindly answer the following question in the Department: Which is the proper way to increase the tension on an Edison Model B; bulge the springs or tighten the gate?"

At the upper and lower right hand corners of the Edison Model B gate will be found a screw protruding through the metal of the gate. The upper one holds the top of the latch. These screws should be set through the gate just far enough so that the gate is exactly square, or level with the face and aperture behind it. That is what the screws are for. The gate should be kept square with the face and aperture thus and any added tension should be secured by bulging the springs by pressing out with a small round rod while running the same up and down under the spring.

In Error.—Lima, O., writes: "I noticed an illustration of method of attaching an outside shutter in Sept. 23 issue. The drawing shows connection to be made by means of a tumbling shaft. I do not understand the use of such a shaft, as the inside shutter bearing is stationary."

Lima then sketches his idea of proper connection, same being a straight shaft connected to inside shutter shaft and supported by a bracket boxing. I have not published his sketch for the reason that I think he is in error. The sketch spoken of is for the Edison Exhibition Model machine. The carriage of this mechanism frames up and down, carrying the shutter with it, while the lens is stationary. You cannot frame an outside shutter up and down in relation to the lens, as would be necessary were Lima's plan followed. The tumbling shaft is to overcome this very thing. If it were practical to frame an outside shutter up and down in relation to the lens, your plan, Lima, would be all right and we would have published your sketch. However, we are indebted to you for submitting it, even though you were in error.

The Law.—Corona, N. Y., writes: "Referring to your answer to Newark, N. J., Sept. 23 issue, would like to inform you that the New York 1911 card is issued to all holding 1910 card. I was looking for information on this point in the Department for some time, not having secured 1911 card on account of the citizenship clause. I finally applied for 1911 card and same was issued at once."

I have stated in the Department the fact that new cards were issued to holders of 1910 cards. The citizenship law was knocked out by the recently enacted state law, as was also stated in this department. Corona must have overlooked it. As the matter now stands there is no citizenship requirement, also the six months' apprenticeship clause is eliminated by a recent judicial decision.

It's a Cage Now.—New York City, N. Y., writes sending in a circular letter from a Brooklyn firm engaged in constructing a fireproof operating room. They say, in part—"Requiring all operators' cages in motion picture theaters to be constructed of—we have a system of fireproof operators' cages."

Well, gentlemen, you are caged at last! I wonder what this enterprising firm, that doesn't know an operating room from a "cage," uses for bars. We have been "cooped" up [illegible] but—caged! Gee!

Comments on the Films

"Her Awakening" (Biograph), September 28.—She worked in a laundry, she was pretty, and didn't chew gum. She dressed as becomingly as a shop girl. Her old mother, on the way to market with a very tattered apron, met her and her "steady," and the girl was ashamed of her mother. A moment later her mother is knocked down by a passing automobile, and taken into the house. She dies in a few minutes. It's a hard awakening for the girl, and the pain is fairly well pictured by the actress. However, it is the portrayal of the old mother that is the most noteworthy thing in the picture. It is a true and human picture, very worth while and commendable.

"Counterfeit Roll" (Lubin), September 29.—The girl at the "Man Haters'" club and the man at his club each left their money beside the respective telephones. They happen to sit at the same table at a restaurant a few moments later. Meanwhile, another man has been arrested for passing counterfeit money; he had picked up a suspicious looking roll. The two at the restaurant finish at the same time, have no money, and are taken to the station-house, where the man with the roll makes a loan, and the two are freed, but—and fate can be cussed mean sometimes—the two meet a little later in a very amusing way, and are taken up again. Club friends come to the rescue. It is certainly a laughable picture, and while not all of it is as good as its best, it is a good film.

"Gypsy Honor" (Pathe), September 28.—The American helped the gypsy girls when they were in the city. The men of the band, later, robbed and bound the American. One of the girls whom he had helped discovered it, and set him free. The band knows this, and breaks camp, the sheriff with a posse in pursuit. The feature of the picture is the running fight, and its end, the capture of the thieves. The girl is spurned by the band, and is taken to his home by the American, where she is befriended by his wife. The picture hardly fulfills the promise of its title; for dramatically it is thin. The pictures are, however, interesting.

"The Mission Waif" (Melies), September 28.—The outlaw, bandit and road agent, with the sheriff and Indians, has been one of the big features of early Western life, and he has figured prominently in many Western motion pictures. About the only way to get heart interest out of a bandit is to make him do some good deed, to reform him. The road agent in this picture defends, from attacking Indians, the mission. The mission waif, a foundling whom the fathers have educated, goes to the cowboy's camp for help. They find the road agent dead at the gate, but they save the mission. The scenes had suggested that it was the road agent's love for the waif, now a grown young woman, that moved him to make the sacrifice. It is an interesting picture. It shows the Indians stealthily creeping up, and also a short fight.

"The Power of Good" (Essanay), September 28.—It looked like the same old hold-up scene, but it is soon apparent that the situation is being handled freshly. The outlaw's actions in the cabin of the woman and her daughter, where, at the point of a pistol, he forces them to give him food and also to send the sheriff's posse on the wrong track, is more commendable for its art than for its ethical value. The next day the outlaw, now wounded, stumbles, fainting, into the cabin of a minister. The minister's daughter bathes his face, and when he is recovering reads to him from the bible. That he falls in love with her and repents is shown with a good measure of effect. He serves his time. It is a very interesting picture, unusually so for its kind.

"Her Hero" (Vitagraph), September 30.—Mr. Brown (Bunny) is one of those men who are very brave when there is no danger and other people are present. Brown's loving wife (Miss Finch) has him bring home a revolver to protect her. It makes him feel big and he yarns to his timid wife about what he would do if he were in the wild West. Bunny pictured as a cowboy is worth seeing. His wife goes to bed. To make her believe that burglars were in the house and that he had frightened them away, he collects the family silver and wraps it up. A real burglar comes and makes no noise. Browne pretends that he hears one and goes down, finds burglar and has a fit. Mrs. Browne picks up the revolver and fires at the retreating burglar. Then she pins a rose on Browne. It's a good comedy.

"His Stubborn Way" (Lubin), October 2.—It might have happened; at least it seems real, for if it had happened it would have happened just that way. The situation is simple. Myrtle's dad was so stubborn that her beau got his friend to let the father see him, playing lover while he courts the old man. It works delightfully. The pantomime is filled with human suggestions as effective as words; more so than any but the truest words could be. It deals almost wholly with those traits of men and women by which we recognize them as kindred human beings. The Lubin Company has been producing some very fine comedies recently. This is as good as the best of them.

"Too Many Burglars (Biograph), October 2.—Dick's wife is so careless with her jewelry that he writes to a friend asking him to play burglar. He doesn't send the letter, but decides to play burglar himself. Wife finds the letter and, for a joke sends it. Real burglar comes; wife makes fun of him. Hubby comes, also his friend. They don't know each other and fight; this scares real burglar, who hides, but sneezes. It is very funny and kept the audience chuckling.

"Eugene Wrayburn" (Edison), October 3.—A very dramatic, though not altogether pleasant, picture. The progress of the girl's love for Wrayburn is plainly depicted, but there are attempted murders caused by jealousy, the death of two persons who struggle beside a canal until they fall in, locked in each other's arms; Wrayburn is thrown into the water and rescued by the girl as he floats down with the current, but eventually he realizes his love for the girl and the gloomy picture ends with happiness in sight. The play will please with its intense dramatic situations.

"The Phoney Strike Breakers" (Kalem), October 2.—A slight but very amusing incident pictured as taking place on a large cattle ranch. The cowboys arranged a "strike" (not in earnest) and carefully rehearsed it. Molly, the ranch girl, was not to be outdone. She got all the girls in the valley together and persuaded them to dress up as men. These are the phoney strike breakers. Everything seems to be going smoothly for the boys, when they happen to notice the strike breakers riding toward the range. They can't see that they are girls and, much concerned, gallop after. There was a good deal of laughter in the house while the film was on. The picture is very fair, but nothing special.

"The Convict's Heart" (Pathe), September 30.—Paul Panzer, as the convict, and little Jack Smith as the boy, play the leading roles in this picture. The convict with chains on his feet escapes by a very skillfully suggested fall over a rocky cliff. The boy, berrying near, helps him and finds him clothes. Five hundred dollars reward is offered for the convict's capture, and the mortgage is past due on the home of the boy's mother. The holder of the mortgage, not getting his money, becomes brutal, and the convict, in hiding near, comes to the rescue. The police are informed. The convict makes the boy arrest him for the reward to pay the mortgage. Mr. Panzer's facial expression is very good, but the whole cast acts with a good deal of naturalness. There is some freshness in the picture.

"A Western Heroine" (Vitagraph), September 27.—The Western heroine (Miss Story) succeeds in getting the large sum of money through to the town office of the mining company. The senior partner had entrusted it to one of his young men. A Mexican saw him start out, and with two Americans determines to rob him. The man sees the bandits in time to save himself from falling into their trap, but they follow him. Desperately wounded, he darts aside and takes refuge in the cottage of the heroine. He gives her the money and tells her to whom it belongs, and then dies. The bandits track the man and attack the house. By a clever ruse, the girl, escaping through a window, gets a good start with the money. The bandit sees her making off and follows, but cannot overtake her, though it is a close call. It is a clearly told, interesting picture.

"A Summer Adventure" (Selig), October 2.—The feature of this film is the presence of wild animals, deer and wolves. They seem almost out of place in a background so filled with suggestions of an old civilization, but they are at least real. The presence of the wolves also gives, more or less effectively, a sense of danger to a little boy, brother of the heroine, who is pictured as lost. The girl's lover was out of favor with the girl's father and his rescue of the kid from the den of the wolves gives him a chance to square things. There are several comic incidents in the film at which the audience laughed. The story is not at all convincing, but there is a good deal of entertainment in it.

"The Strike at the Little Jonny Mine" (Essanay), September 30.—The mob scene in this film is exciting and it is a tense moment when the superintendent and the faithful Logan are almost overpowered just as the sheriff arrives. So far as the picture dealing with the labor question is concerned, it only shows some scenes in a strike. The heroic action of the woman in rising from a sick bed and riding for aid rouses the sympathy of the audience, while the steadfast determination of Logan to stand by the company is commendable. That he succeeds in securing the consent of the superintendent to increase wages is quite as much to his credit as the superintendent's. The film tells a good story, punctuated with some exciting incidents, but it is in no sense a homily upon labor difficulties.

"The Nearsighted Chaperone" (Lubin), September 30.—A comedy with a new situation. Aunty bothers the lovers. So they induce two servants to don proper toggery and assume their places in the library, while the lovers themselves escape from Aunty's vigilance into the conservatory. The scheme worked admirably and they were unmolested for a considerable time, or until Aunty began to discuss the lateness of the hour, when the servant made the fact known by hurling his slipper. The lovers returned to the library and shortly afterward the young man bade them good-night.

"The Maiden of the Pie-Faced Indians" (Edison), September 30.—A very funny travesty upon the usual Indian, maiden and cowboy rescue story. While it keeps the audience laughing all the time, it goes further, perhaps, than the producers intended and clearly illustrates the absurdities which often creep into the usual Indian story. Silently the maiden is captured, though she is screaming at the top of her lungs. Fauntleroy is tied to a tree and cruelly tortured, and after he is rescued calmly walks away with the tree to which he was fastened. And there are many other equally funny and interesting episodes in the film. It deserves to be popular since it contains humor of a rare and altogether commendable sort.

"Turning the Tables" (Edison), September 30.—A short comedy in which a poor, downtrodden man succeeds in getting the best of his Xantippe wife. He makes her believe her first husband has returned from sea and in the end she is arrested and locked up for creating a very serious disturbance. The success of the experiment seems to justify the attempt. The husband apparently succeeds in accomplishing his purpose to tame her.

"When He Died" (Essanay), September 29.—Some will object to this film upon the ground that it makes mirth of what is a solemn subject. Children placed crêpe upon a sick man's door while at play and his associates believed him dead. Of course, they were pleased to find he was alive, but the mirth which follows appears rather unseemly. A considerable proportion of the average audience will remember times in their own experience when crêpe hung on the door of their own or some friend's house, and the effect will not be altogether pleasing. The story is well told, but is one of those tales which would have been just as well unsaid.

"The Blackfoot Half-Breed" (Kalem), September 29.—This film begins with a proposition that will be repugnant to many—a marriage of a white man and an Indian woman. The daughter born to them, sent East to be educated, returns a beautiful girl. When she goes to visit her mother there is trouble enough for all. The end is that she has to return to her mother's tepee to prevent hostilities breaking out between the Indians and the soldiers. Almost forced into a marriage with a chief, she is rescued by her fiance, the dashing captain, at the head of a party of mounted soldiers. The battle is rather fatal to the Indians. The girl finally renounces her tribe. It is not a human nor a very interesting picture.

"The Death of Nathan Hale" (Edison), September 29.—Another film in the historic series which is being released by this house. It tells the story of Hale well as he has read it in the books and keeps the important dates correct. Perhaps the most striking scene is the last, where the execution suddenly switches into the statue of Hale which stands in City Hall Park in New York. This is startling, since from the scene of the execution to the statue of a great city. The actor who plays Washington has not quite reached the dignity of the person he represents. Gen. Putnam is well reproduced, however, and the likeness of Hale is well maintained. Altogether, however, it is a good film and deserves to be included in the series of educational subjects.

"The Ninety and Nine" (Vitagraph), September 29.—A domestic story presenting in some detail the fortunes of an erring son who is driven from home and finds work on a farm. While motoring in that vicinity, his family meet with an accident and during the time of necessary repairs to the car they meet their son. There is a very pleasant re-union. The picture is one that will appeal strongly to the domestic emotions.

"The Bell Ringer of the Abbey" (Pathe), September 29.—A fairy story which tells how a bell ringer, beset by the Devil, and in terror lest his bells should not ring properly, befriends a ragged boy and discovers that he has really assisted an angel. The angel overcomes the machinations of the evil one and the bells ring the curfew as they should. It is a pretty story and one that will please a large number. There is always something especially attractive in this kind of story. It seems to affect the emotions strangely, but none the less certainly.

"Across the Polar Seas" (Pathe), September 29.—A scenic which will give a good idea of what Arctic explorers have to encounter in their journeys. It makes the sightseer chilly to look at it, so powerfully does it affect the imagination. The photography is well done and the reproduction of polar scenery is sufficiently accurate to satisfy the average critic.

"John Oakhurst, Gambler" (Selig), September 30.—The story of a gambler who falls in love with an innocent girl. She turns away her old sweetheart for the gambler, as many another girl has done before, but the gambler, more of a man than most of them are, realizes that he is unworthy of her and reunites the couple, leaving them in their happiness. His better nature shines out very clearly in this action, and the sympathy of the audience goes with him when he leaves, heavy-hearted and sad.

"The Rival Stage Lines" (Selig), October 3.—This picture exists for the sake of picturing one trip of the rival stages, each trying by fair means and foul to get to Cactus first and so win the express company's contract. The stages were owned by rivals in love. The girl was present with her accepted fiance, who was not known, and rode in one of the stages. One owner employs cowboys, the other Indians, both giving blank cartridges, to hold up his competitor. The cowboys make the first move, but hearing the Indians attacking the other stage, rush to the rescue. In the melee, the girl and her beau drive off one of the stages and claim and also get the contract. It is speedy, but not a vital picture. There is fun of a kind in it, but no heart interest. It isn't powerful.

"Little Moritz Is Too Short" (Pathe), October 2.—The diminutive size of this individual has caused him much trouble. In this instance it costs him the consent of his sweetheart's father. Bill, nothing daunted, re-appears on stilts, and secures the formerly withheld consent. He fell down, however, and couldn't rise. Thus his deceit was discovered, but the stern father relented and little Moritz was made everlastingly happy.

"Rangoon, India" (Pathe), October 2.—A travelog giving a series of excellent views of this old city. Like all of Pathe's pictures of this character it is instructive and affords a clear idea of some of the phases of its life.

"Grandma" (Essanay), October 3.—A picture that is a very welcome tribute to the ideal grandma, and perhaps grandmas come near to the ideal more often than anything else in life. The lady who portrays this grandma invests the part with a charm and sweetness that surely will touch the hearts of thousands. She pictures in truth a dear old grandma. The story is simple. The little girl of very fashionable parents was neglected. The grandmother steps into the mother's place in the child's affections, and the mother sadly comes to realize that she hasn't been doing her duty, and makes up with tenderness for lost time. The scenes at grandma's farm are delightful. It is a very pleasing picture.

(Pathe's Weekly No. 40) October 3.—Before long we will begin to wonder how we ever got along without these topical picturs of the week's most notable events. In diversity of subject matter and general interest this number maintains the high standard set by former topical films. It is an important film to every exhibitor and spectator.

"The Wager" (Vitagraph), October 3.—Young Macey was such a bore talking about his fiancée, Gladys, that his friend Masters made a wager with him that he could kiss Gladys at her party and in Macey's presence. This is the situation of the picture, and it is not a very vital one. The wager was won by Masters, who dressed up as Gladys's aunt, whom the girl had never seen, but who was expected on a visit. There is only one good laugh in it. It is when the true aunt arrives and Masters takes off his disguise. The early scenes were almost wholly conventional and tiresome.

"For $200" (Melies), September 21.—It is not the use of old facts that makes a picture trite; for works of art that are truly human remain young forever. It is the use of conventionalities in place of first-hand observation of life that makes a story or a picture uninteresting. The hero of this picture needed $200 to cure his daughter of blindness. This situation is entirely trite, but the picture doesn't depend upon it. It's purpose is to draw in profile a phase of life and show something of the common bond of sympathy that unites men. The man, seeking work, gets a job at an oil well, and shortly after is the means of saving the life of his foreman's little girl. It is a heroic act, and the workmen at the well, when they hear of his own child's pitiful predicament, led by the foreman, put in the hat passed by the foreman's wife the funds necessary to have the girl's eyes attended to. This part of the story is fresh. The scenes that show the cure of the child's eyes are wholly conventional and if they had been simply omitted, it would have helped the picture.

"The Saving Sign" (Kalem), October 4.—An Indian story which represents an Indian making a sign, which he says is sacred. The white man to whom he explains it, teaches it to his daughter, and, later, when she is captured by the Indians, now become hostile, it saves her from torture and causes the amazed chief to bury the hatchet and agree to permanent peace. The picture is well acted, and the idea of the sacred character of the sign is well emphasized.

"The Idle Boast" (Lubin), October 4.—Here is a film that preaches a good sermon. Success as measured by money and the success of accomplishment are contrasted. The arrest of the one man at the banquet, who had acquired a large fortune, may appeal strongly to a considerable proportion of discontented individuals who envy such men their possessions. The suggested suicides are quite as effective as though the audience was treated to the grewsome spectacle. The picture throughout is well conceived and clearly acted, and will, no doubt, be very popular.

"A Jealous Wife" (Eclipse), October 4.—The principal center of attraction is the attempted suicide of a wife, who fails, through jealousy for "Fifi," whom her husband persists in sending to the house. Imagine the consternation when it is discovered that Fifi is only a pet toy dog.

"The Grand Chartreuse" (Eclipse), October 4.—A beautiful outdoor picture, showing the scenery along one of those marvelous French mountain roads.

"Ezra and the Fortune Teller" (Eclipse), October 4.—A trick film of merit, baffling in some of its manifestations. It possesses a number of novel scenes, and if all audiences like it as well as one in New York did its popularity is assured.

"The Summer Girl" (Edison), October 4.—To gain his point and make a rival unable to keep his promise to a girl, a young fellow puts on dresses and sits near the rival's clothes when he is in swimming. Of course he can't come out and dress and he can't keep his appointment. Later, when the supposed lady wanders away, it is too late. The feminine apparel is discarded and the young man condoles with the girl and wins her. The audience enjoys the contest of wits and is quite disposed to applaud the winner.

"The Mate of The John M." (Vitagraph), October 4.—A lovestory of the sea, told with a fervor and convincing power that carries conviction. The shipwreck, the escape of all but the mate, their safe arrival home, is followed some time later by the mate's. The girl couldn't forget him, and, thought he suspected a rival, he discovered upon his return that his jealousy was groundless. The film closes with a pretty picture. The audience made its appreciation understood.

"Crazy Dope" (Pathe), October 4.—A film combining several comedy features. Its principal feature is the showing of increased efficiency which results after partaking of a quantity of the elixirs. The assistant drinks all of them, and the result is funny enough to make any audience laugh. It created a stir in New York.

"Circus in Australia" (Pathe), October 4.—A picture of scenic value and intended to give some idea of the country, its life and scenery. The picture admirably accomplishes its purpose.

"The Derelict" (Rex), September 28.—This reviewer is under the impression that this is the strongest film of the week. There is the old story of the girl cast up from the sea, with the love of a young fisherman as the result. But even while the young people are dreaming of bliss, a chest is cast up, which shows that the girl is a leper who was being conveyed to the leper colony. The young man, true to his love, will not give her up, and together they depart for a lone island. She, realizing the sacrifice he is making, takes the only course to prevent it, and makes herself the bride of the sea forever. It seems a simple story, yet the pathos of two blighted lives casts a gloom over it. The sacrifice of the young man, and following that the sacrifice of the young woman, are both examples of nobility of character well worth seeing. It must help anyone to see these two scenes. Not many motion pictures have offered anything better. Indeed, the film in all its qualities is well worth seeing. The acting is up to the usual standard of the Rex films, while the mechanical work is well done. The pictures of the sea are interesting in themselves, apart from their connection with the story. This film should be one of the most interesting the Rex people have released.

"The East and the West" (Thanhouser), October 6.—O San, the little Japanese girl, was a dancer. She was attracted by the West, and came to New York, where her art made her successful. She thought she was in love with the New York man. He married an American girl. The hour seems gloomy, but the mist is swept away from her heart by a love letter from Japan. She returns to her home, and we see a wedding ceremony as it is performed in Japan. For the most part (not wholly) the situation is handled in a dainty way, quite fresh and sweet. It seems a pity, though, to have the Japanese girl dance in costume like a New York ballet dancer. It is a very interesting picture.

"Riding Feats of the 15th Cavalry" (Solax), October 4.—Cavalry feats of this kind have been shown before, even recently, by Solax films. It is an interesting exhibition.

"A Breezy Morning" (Solax), October 4.—On the same reel with Cavalry Feats, this overdrawn farce pictures the complicated happenings in two adjoining apartments and in the hall. The morning was breezy. The girl who was expecting her sister left her apartment for a moment. The man in the next apartment left to get his newspaper. The wind blew the door closed. He was in pajamas, and had no key. He foolishly went into the girl's apartment and shut the door. She, with her sister, arrives, and she has no key. The man's wife and son arrive later, and there are more complications. The picture is poorly acted, and will be considered by many as foolish.

"The Call of the Hills" (Powers), October 3.—The call of the hills came to the violinist as he played. His boyhood had been spent among the hills, but there no one cared for his music save a girl. His father cast him off. He found a friend in the city, and presumably became famous. This friend was loved by him, but she chose another, and he returned to the hills. There he meets the former sweetheart, and both are happy. It is not very well acted.

"A Matrimonial Idyl" (Powers), October 3.—There was a rhyme some years ago that was popular and told the whole story from the time the man with a mustache made a mash with the girl in a hammock with a book, to the time when the man walking back and forth with the baby stepped on a tack and said what was, perhaps, profane. It is now shown in this picture, which makes fair light entertainment.

"The Love of the West" (American), October 2.—An atmosphere of expanse and bigness and freedom is one of this picture's most noticeable features. It is a humanly truthful story, with a slight, but significant, incident behind it. It deals with a man's love for the great West, and with a girl's love for the social city. These young people were engaged, but when the girl came to spend a few weeks at the ranch, she became homesick. The man couldn't give up the West, and go with her back to the city, so they wisely separated. It is fairly well acted, although there is a little camera consciousness in three or four scenes; and there is also a touch of conventionality in the acting apparent at times. It is, however, a good and very commendable picture, true, not shallow, and interesting.

"The Miner's Wife" (American), October 5.—"Thanks for the grub and the woman." That is what the "undesirable" man, kicked out elsewhere, but befriended by the miner, left pinned to the door of the cabin. He then dragged the young miner's wife away. The old Indian hag (in fine portrayal) brings the miner the news. In the picture's showing of the chase of this villain and the rescue of the weary and terrified woman, there is a freshness and a dramatic force that is remarkable. It is a pity that the camera work should be below American standard in so effective and dramatic a picture as this. A skillful operator was compelled to hunt for clear focus all through it. Otherwise the picture is very strong.

"Barbara Frietchie" (Champion), October 2.—It's an emotional picture, but only because of Barbara Frietchie. Her face is like Joan of Arc's, and her part of the picture is fine. The rest of it is mostly Barbara's niece's love story, and is neither better nor worse than other so-called historical pictures. This one may be unhistorical, but it certainly is not slow. It is fairly well set and photographed.

"The Red Man's Penalty" (Bison), October 3.—This is a cavalry and Indian picture, with a rescue after a brisk engagement. Some of the scenes are pictorially excellent, with much depth and atmosphere. The uprising which led to the capture of the lieutenant and the girl was caused by the bad meat the brutal and dishonest commissioner for that reservation gave to the Indians. He was killed, but the Indians were very heavily punished. It is a good, stirring picture.

"A Quiet Evening" (Reliance), October 4.—There was no room in the house where the old man with a numerous family could find a quiet place to read his paper in. It is a farce comedy. It drags a little, but has some laughs.

"Winning Papa's Consent" (Reliance), October 4.—The couple, even after they were married, were very, very, very affectionate. Papa's vehemently expressed rage was in contrast. The parent came to the hotel where they were stopping and behaved so harshly that the son ran to get his mother. When he brought her in his father's motor-car, they found that the young wife and her father-in-law were getting on splendidly. The interiors of the picture are very garishly furnished. The film is acceptable as light entertainment, but it is not an artistic film.

"The Branded Indian" (Powers), October 7.—Indian plays poker with half-breed, wins all his money and his horse and then the half-breed claims he stole it. After Indian is captured, the half-breed brands him on the cheek. He becomes an outlaw. Half-breed wounds the sheriff's daughter, is killed by the Indian, who dies of his wounds while bringing the girl in. It is not an artistic play. It has no elements that are likely to please any but rough audiences. It hardly can be called a commendable picture.

"The Story of the Rose" (Imp), October 2.—The rose is given to a discontented city man by a girl in the country whom he asked for a drink of water. Almost wholly by poetry the growth of love between them is pictured. The young wife finds the withered rose where he had left it, pressed in his Bible. It is a pretty and acceptable picture.

"Through the Air" (Imp), October 5.—An immense airship, a dirigible, plays an important part in this melodrama. The villain tries to rob the heroine's father of his claim when he finds that the man has discovered pay dirt. The air man can go faster in his balloon than the villain can ride, and to help the girl he uses his ship and beats the villain, who is in a motor car, to the claim office. The great ship creeps out of its hangar, then takes life and moves. There is no race; we merely see the aeronaut there first. The airship alone makes the film worth while. It tells no strong story.

"The Goose Girl" (Yankee), October 6.—She was an American girl and there were geese on her father's farm. She was flighty and the city man turned her head. Sue, the girl, broke with her sweetheart and came to the city and married the city man, who soon deserted her. The sweetheart comes to the city, finds her impoverished and steals money from her husband for her. When arrested, he shows up the man and the charge isn't pressed. The man drowns himself. The picture isn't strong artistically, and ethically and in human values, is pitiably weak.

"Neighbors" (Lux), October 6.—One who saw the policeman taking the two neighbors to the station house would probably be at a loss to decide who was being taken up—the two neighbors, their dogs, or the cop, with odds on the cop. One day later these two neighbors found that their dogs had made friends. One would hardly believe it. It amusing and will be acceptable.

"Bill Has a Bath" (Lux), October 6.—[illegible] had fallen in an ink black gutter. He gets many pails of baths, but the one that the home boys give will be more likely to make the audience laugh than any in the dozen rooms at his girl's home. But that was a long [illegible] a film that is amusing.

"The White Tulip" (Great Northern), October 7.—In answer to an old maid's matrimonial advertisement to her young blades proposed a meeting place with a white tulip in the coat. Many different kinds of flowers met the ad, and there's a good market for white tulips. Meanwhile the [illegible] young men have given their white tulips to a fully unknown who is surprised at the interest of attention he receives from all the girls who come to the meeting place. A cop, the police, thinking it a meeting of women pickpockets, raid the place and force them to the police court. It is a most laughable and commendable farce.

"The Five Rose Sisters" (Thanhouser), October 6.—The Five Rose Sisters were a theatrical troupe [illegible] left his farm to them. In the little village they were received well at first till the deacon's daughter found out that they had been on the stage; then they were in hard luck, especially the pretty one whom the minister loved. But if all the people who self-righteously make trouble for others were roasted before death as badly as this deacon and his daughter, it would be well. The picture has the elements of popularity. It is interesting and well-made.

"The Anonymous Letter" (Reliance), October 7.—The situation behind the picture is, or seems to be, quite impossible. To make matters worse, it is very unpleasant. Supposing, however, that a son, old enough to be at college, and brought home sick, could be kept in ignorance, even in convalescence, that the woman who was acting as his nurse was his stepmother when he knew that his father had just been married and also that the father could have been made so jealous by an anonymous letter, the situation is dramatic. There is little good acting in the picture except that of William Walthall as Carter, the sender of the letter. He portrays with a remarkable power of suggestion a foreign, snaky character.

"Those Jersey Cowpunchers" (Nestor), October 4.—This is a dandy burlesque on the moving picture cowboy situation. The Nestor people went out West to take a real "Western," but the producer found no cowboys. He had to telegraph home for the "prop" cow punchers. The picture shows just how the picture was taken and Miss Violet is rescued. The producer is always present in the picture and we see him scolding the Indians. One Indian got hit too hard and the scene had to be taken over. At night the party washed up and went home. This picture is likely to be a thorough-going success. It is worthy of it.

"Lost Illusions" (Rex), October 5.—Nell lived in a forest cabin with her father and has a forest lover; but an artist spends the summer in the neighborhood and she falls in love with him. He returns to the East. Two years later, when the father dies, Nell marries the forest lover, who sells his claim and takes her to the East. Nell's clothes humiliate her and she buys much fine raiment. She meets the artist. After a tense scene or two, her husband leaves her and returns to his cabin alone. The girl finds that the artist is married. She loses an illusion. Returning home, she is wounded by her husband, who takes her for an intruder. This is the cause of a reconciliation. The picture has much of interest, is well-knit and intelligently acted. The subject is sensational; that is its chief drawback.

"Meddling Parson" (Nestor), October 7.—A slight satire on the meddling parson. This parson interrupted a quiet game and then got the captain of the precinct to raid the house as a joke. The men were using stage money only. Before the real cop arrived, a burglar in police uniform held up the party. So everybody was "stung." There is some amusement in it, but it is very slight and its fun is on the [illegible] order.

THE BITER BITTEN.

An Imp Comedy of a Deal in Worthless Summer Resort Property in which the Tables Are Turned.

It is seldom that a shark real estate dealer gets the worst of it in a transaction, but the Imp company has produced a very funny comedy in which the victim profits in the end. An aged bookkeeper, with a large family, is induced to purchase a lot on the installment plan, to the consternation of his wife, as she needs his weekly salary to pay bills. The family packs lunch baskets and goes out to inspect the purchase and finds it located in a swamp—worthless. They are all disgusted and the father chucks the deed in the water. One of the sharks who sold him the lot has bought a bungalow in that locality and is annoyed by mosquitoes. The only way to rid himself of the pests is to drain and fill the swamp. The matter is talked over and the victim overhears. He hustles back and resurrects his deed and eventually sells his lot for a fabulous price, as the wealthier men must have it to make their possessions habitable. It is a case of turning the tables very neatly and the sharks lose in the end.

MILTON'S MASTERPIECES IN PICTURES.

Great things have already been done in motion pictures that bear the imprint of the Vitagraph Company of America. Still greater things are to be done by this same company. They have in course of preparation two classics from the pen of John Milton, which will be given animated interpretations, both masterpieces of this great mind, "Paradise Lost" and "Paradise Regained." The Vitagraph aim is to make these productions even more wonderful than anything they have ever evolved, meeting the high standard of quality and the cultured tastes which the Vitagraph life portrayals have established in the minds of the people.

"THE SCANDAL MONGERS" (Lubin).

"For greatest scandal waits on greatest state," says the Bard of Avon. A cleverly acted story depicting the growth of scandal will be released by the Lubin Company on October 23rd. It is entitled "The Scandal Mongers" and has to do with Norrine Lucas and Ethel Gerhart, who were as different from each other as Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde.

Norrine's unselfish and winning ways had made her extremely popular. Her popularity was a constant source of annoyance to Ethel and her mother, both of whom possessed natures jealous of the virtues of others.

It happened that the two girls were sent to the same private school where Norrine's popularity continued and finally aroused the jealousy of Ethel to such an extent that she hit upon a scheme to throw a shadow upon Norrine's character. Ethel accordingly hid some money taken from another student's room between two towels belonging to Norrine. Ethel also saw to it that the money was discovered.

Scene from "The Scandal Mongers" (Lubin).

Norrine, too dazed to defend herself, was expelled and returned home broken-hearted. Ethel hypocritically pretended belief in Norrine's innocence, but wrote home to her mother full particulars of the accusation, which mother quickly spread through the town. Norrine was shunned by everybody.

A young evangelist, attracted by the sad, sweet face of the accused girl, wrote to the principal of the school and finally arrived at a knowledge of Ethel's part in the little plot. Then he preached a sermon, taking for his text, "Thou shalt not steal," and presented it with such magnetism that Ethel suddenly jumped to her feet, confessed her part in the plot and threw herself sobbing convulsively into her mother's arms.

The picture ends with a pretty love scene between the minister and Norrine.

REPORTS GOOD BUSINESS AT WICHITA.

The Wichita Film and Supply Company, of Wichita, Kan., reports that business has opened fine in its territory. The exchange has more business than it can take care of. Olsen Brothers, the proprietors, are also running the Pastime Theatre, which has a seating capacity of 1,000, and are playing to capacity business at five-cent admissions.

"MAUD MULLER" (Selig).

The Selig Company are releasing on Oct. 5th an exceptionally beautiful production of Maud Muller, that immortal poetic masterpiece of Whittier's.

"Of all sad words of tongue or pen,
The saddest are these—It might have been'"

This quotation will be recognized as a mighty bit of word painting from that wonderfully human verse. It has been extensively used in song and story and the poem itself has been dramatized in a dozen languages. Further than that, it has been used several times as the foundation for picturization, so our subject is not new except in its treatment.

Mr. Selig, who has given the picture world so many productions of this nature, has given to this old classic a setting and environment that will, it is believed, far outshadow any previous handling of the subject. Critics who have witnessed the production at private exhibition declare that once again Selig has proven that even material that has been used can be again and again vitalized and made more interesting each time when it is produced with a view to the artistic rather than the commercial needs. In the Selig production, Miss Kathlyn Williams plays the part of Maud Muller, and Mr. Charles Clary, the dignified judge.

With all that poetic charm of which Whittier was absolute master, he pictures to us a midsummer day's casual meeting between Maud Muller, a simple country lass, and the Judge, refined, dignified, and born to the purple. The Judge tarries a moment by Maud's hayfield to quaff a cup of spring water. Perchance he lingers a little longer than necessary—at any rate, as they separate, each becomes conscious of a pitiful longing that has lodged in their hearts. The years roll on—Maud marries a man, unlearned and poor; the Judge weds a woman of his own caste, who lives for fashion, while he lives for power; and still, in the heart of both the Judge and the country lass, there lingers that aching void—that pitiful yearning that will never realize satisfaction—and many a time and oft into the mind of each comes this thought: "And of all sad words of tongue or pen, the saddest are these—'It might have been.'"

ADVANCE CO.'S TOPICAL PICTURES.

A superior picture of the big aviation meet held under the auspices of the Aero Club of Illinois, at Chicago, in August, and a Labor Day parade at Aurora, Ill., are among the recent productions of the Advance Motion Picture Co., of Chicago. The aviation picture will be released as a special subject and is said to be the best picture of the kind. It contains many interesting scenes about the aerodrome, showing the process of making ascensions, the hangars and other matters of import relating to aviation. An arrangement has been made with the Aero Club to take exclusive pictures of the contestants for the Hearst coast to coast prize.

The Aurora Labor Day pictures were taken especially for Frank Thielen, of the Star and Fox theaters of that city. This subject covers scenes from the time the head of the parade, showing the floats and other displays, to the department run which illustrates the fire fighting methods of Aurora. The picture is concluded with views of Fox River Park, showing the crowds listening to the various speakers. These pictures were first exhibited at the Fox Theater and were given a rousing reception. From that house they went over the entire Thielen circuit.

This idea of picturing cities the motion picture way is becoming quite popular throughout the West, and the Advance Motion Picture Company has secured a number of contracts for that line of work.

AMERICAN SLIDE COMPANY.

Under the above title the good will and chattels of the Cleaveland Slide Company, of Washington C. H., Ohio, have been transferred to Columbus, Ohio, where the business will henceforth be conducted. The new company will have its offices in the Columbia Building, 162½ North High Street, where a full equipment for the manufacture of advertising and announcement slides has been installed. Ned Cleaveland, the well-known artist, will be in charge of the art department of the American Slide Company, which insures the patrons of the highest quality of work.

The Mercury Arc-Rectifier.

A Device Popular in San Francisco Photo-Play Houses—Proves Good Advertisement.

By C. L. Mosely.

THE innate desire of Westerners to be amused when not at work makes San Francisco a good show town. They truly appreciate grand opera, vaudeville and photoplays. The straight moving picture theaters and mixed vaudeville houses, however, receive the bulk of patronage, and are first-class in all respects. Market street alone has fourteen vaudeville houses within a distance of four blocks, with other "circuit" vaudeville theaters only a few paces off Market. The Mission and Fillmore Street districts each have an equal or higher percentage. There are about one hundred houses showing moving pictures, or an average of one to every 4,000 of population.

The photoplay houses are unquestionably the best of their kind and are completely supplied with all classes of up-to-date apparatus and conveniences. Each theater is assured of its proper supply of films through the operation of a well-maintained delivery system. The reel-chute is located just behind the operator, thus permitting him to snatch up a new reel without delay as soon as it is delivered by the circuit messengers. The film exchanges furnish these messengers. They make a predetermined circuit of the theaters under contract, and their arrival is so accurately timed as to be almost simultaneous with the moment the operator extracts a used film from the machine.

The advent of mercury arc rectifiers inaugurated a great boom in the moving picture show business. The Premium theaters, a string of seven houses incorporated in San Francisco by Mr. Ross, president and manager of the Premium Theaters Company, were among the first to adopt them. The results obtained at these theaters served to clearly demonstrate the advantages of the rectifiers. They not only cut the current bills in half, but also caused such an increase of patronage that the cost of installation became a secondary consideration.

During the seasons of '09 and '10, small, renovated houses, of about 200 seating capacity, sprang up at nearly every corner, with the chairs purchased on the instalment plan and the one machine usually "placed" upon a sixty days' trial. Business proved so profitable that a man could start with only a grubstake and in a few months' time pay for his rectifier without any inconvenience. On the other hand, owing to the great saving in the rectifier owner's light bills, and the assured increase and hold of patronage, the contract agents instead of taking any chances reaped a good profit on the sale of the rectifier and also on the wiring and installation.

About this time the representatives of the General Electric Company gave a series of lectures before the operators' union, explaining the simplicity of operation of the G. E. Rectifier and demonstrating by lantern slides the superior quality of the light obtained at approximately half the cost of other methods. As a result, the selling enthusiasm of the various contract agents reached such a pitch that three of the most prominent dealers drew straws to determine who should receive the next shipment of rectifiers.

An interesting phase in the use of the rectifiers was the various methods adopted by their inherent advertising value. In the Premium theaters the rectifiers were placed in the show cases displaying the premiums given away by the management. These cases were placed directly opposite the box office in the lobby and naturally attracted much attention. Others built glass booths in the center of the lobby so that the people could walk around the rectifier. Gold lettering on the glass advised them as to the character and use of the apparatus, and incidentally called attention to the vast difference between the pictures shown inside and those exhibited elsewhere by other means of illumination. The introduction of something very much alive into the design of the lobby never failed to attract the crowd and the astonishing spectacle of "fire floating on mercury" seemed to guarantee that they would "get their money's worth" there and nowhere else.

Another interesting scheme suggested the installation of the rectifier under a plate glass sidewalk paneled in front of the lobby; it certainly has the ear marks of a unique and clever form of advertising.

In order to fully realize how much the rectifiers are appreciated by the photoplayhouse managers in San Francisco, it should be known that in many cases old direct current service was changed over to alternating current for operating the rectifiers, thus enabling them to obtain in a roundabout but more efficient way the more desirable direct current from the rectifier. The ease with which this could be done was demonstrated at the Premium theaters and was quickly followed in the other houses already having direct current supply.

Premium Theater, San Francisco, Cal.

Furthermore, a general consideration of the subject of the value of rectifiers in the Moving Picture World shows that the results obtained have more than warranted the expense of developing a special type of mercury arc rectifier for use with moving picture machines.

Another point of interest to rectifier users is the maintenance cost, which depends largely upon the length of life of the tubes. The San Francisco operators find this more than satisfactory. The guaranteed average life of a tube is 600 hours, but records of 5,000 hours and over for both 40 and 50 ampere tubes are so common now that the factor of tube life practically has no bearing on the present availability or future success of mercury-arc rectifiers as indispensable accessories of a successful photoplayhouse.

At a recent meeting of the Royal Geographical Society in London, Captain G. U. Rawling, in giving a lecture descriptive of the work of an expedition to Dutch New Guinea, exhibited a number of interesting films of the principal scenes and incidents witnessed by the explorer.

Reliance Under New Management.

C. O. Baumann Withdraws to Devote His Time to Bison Interests—J. C. Graham and J. V. Ritchey Now in Control.

Independent motion picture circles were startled last week by the announcement that Mr. C. O. Baumann had disposed of his interests in the Reliance Company which was organized by him and conducted under his personal direction with considerable success for some time. The purchasers are announced to be Mr. J. C. Graham, of St. Louis, Mo., and Mr. J. V. Ritchey of Chicago, Ill. Mr. Graham was associated for a long time with Mr. H. E. Aitken in the Old Western Film Exchange, since consolidated with the Cranford and Swanson interests of that city. Mr. Ritchey has been engaged in the amusement business for the past ten years and his interests are distributed widely, embracing a number of large vaudeville and picture houses.

In speaking of the change, Mr. Baumann explained to a representative that he had found the burdens which he had taken up too onerous, and believed that he was benefitting the varied interests which he represented by relieving himself of part of them.

"It has been a heavy task to properly supervise the production of Bison films, the making of Reliance films, the handling of our Itala and Ambrosio imports, and the conduct of the large factory at Coney Island.

"I have determined to bend all my energies toward the production of sensational, spectacular Western dramas, and believe that with the Reliance company off my shoulders I can give the exhibitors of America a line of Bison films which will attract the masses into their theaters, thereby giving an added impetus to the entire industry.

"It is with mingled regret and pleasure that I withdraw from the Reliance Company—regret that I will not see the fulfillment under my personal supervision of many ambitious plans now under way, and pleasure that the men at the wheel who will henceforth guide the destinies of the company are so ably fitted to conduct the business on a plane which must mean success to themselves and gratification to exhibitors.

"I am thoroughly convinced that Messrs. Graham and Ritchey will more than keep every promise made to exhibitors. Those familiar with the moving picture trade know that the first year of a company's existence is necessarily a stormy one, and the Reliance Company has passed all the rocks and shoals and is sailing smoothly in safe waters.

"On behalf of myself and my associates, I want to extend to the film renters and exhibitors our hearty appreciation of the co-operation we have experienced. I have found more sentiment in the film business, and more loyalty in times of stress, than in any other field of endeavor I have ever been connected with. Now that Messrs. Graham and Ritchey are taking up the work with what is perhaps the best equipped studio in America and a factory in perfect condition, by devoting their efforts to the production of good plays they cannot fail to give the trade the quality of film which has been the goal strived for.

"The change means better Reliance and better Bison films," concluded Mr. Baumann.

IMPROVEMENTS AT THE LUBIN PLANT.

Though the large and handsome new plant of the Lubin Company at 20th Street and Indiana Avenue, Philadelphia has been completed only about a year, a number of enlargements and improvements have already been found necessary to keep pace with the increasing business.

A large brick and concrete garage has been completed of sufficient capacity to hold all the machines of the company. Another large building just completed is a film vault made entirely of brick, steel and concrete without one splinter of combustible material in it. It is divided into a number of compartments separated from each other by fire-proof walls.

An excavation has been made and the foundations are already laid for a new high-pressure steam heating plant which will be equipped with the latest and best boilers and appliances for heating the buildings.

The immense daylight studio is about to undergo alterations which will more than double its capacity. Another floor will be added which will be lighted by daylight through the prism glass roofing and sides. On the first floor another artificial light stage will be added.

Another large Mack auto bus has been added to the equipment for the use of the actors. It is so arranged that it can be used as a dressing-room.

Wages of English operators are, according to British trade journals, ridiculously small. Eleven and twelve dollars is considered "good pay" and fifteen dollars a week is regarded as a princely wage.

O'KALEMS RETURN.

Members of the O'Kalem Company of photoplayers who have been in Ireland for the past four months, returned home on the White Star steamship Cedric, Friday, October 6, and were greeted by a host of friends. The only absentee of the number who sailed away on June 3 last was Mr. Arthur Donaldson, who has gone on to Stockholm, Sweden, to fill a long and lucrative engagement in the Oscar Theater. As for the rest of the company, they were in the best of spirits and well browned by the ocean breezes.

Miss Gauntier as "The Colleen Bawn."

In this connection we are pleased to reproduce a postcard photograph of Miss Gauntier in the character of "The Colleen," as she appeared in the three-reel Kalem production of "The Colleen Bawn."

According to the present plans of the Irish company, they will complete a few studio scenes upon their arrival in New York, and then prepare for the winter campaign in Florida. The Dense mansion on the St. John's River, near Jacksonville, has been leased for the company's accommodation, and a studio will be erected for the staging of interior scenes. The Southern company will be materially strengthened.

NEW NESTOR PLAYERS.

New talent has been added to the company of Nestor players. Among the recent acquisitions are Miss Dorothy Davenport, a niece of Fanny Davenport and granddaughter of E. L. Davenport, famous dramatic artists. She will play leading parts in the Nestor Eastern company. Miss Eugenie Forde, an actress of long stock experience, will fill a similar position with the Western company. Work is progressing rapidly on the new Nestor factory, which will be ready for occupancy by December 1.

HERBERT MILES RESIGNS.

Herbert L. Miles, for some time secretary and general manager of the Motion Picture Distributing and Sales Company, has tendered his resignation to the board of directors of that company. The Moving Picture World has been informed upon reliable authority that the position occupied by Mr. Miles has been practically abolished and that the business of the company will be placed in the hands of a competent man who will work under the direction of the board.

THANHOUSER GETS AUSTIN FLOOD PICTURES.

The heart-rending scenes of suffering, horror and devastation wrought by the Austin Flood, the most disastrous flood since the Johnstown, was filmed by the Thanhouser Company. As soon as the news of the breaking of the Bayless Dam was flashed across the country, the Thanhouser Company dispatched a staff of camera men down to the seat of the calamity. The men were back Monday with 2,000 feet; 750 feet of the most remarkable of the pictures taken were used. By Monday evening, prints were exhibited in the Scene of Great Disaster at Austin, Pa.

Thanhouser studio. This is one of the most remarkable feats recorded, and is an example of the enterprise and the working facilities of the Thanhouser Company.

The pictures graphically show the havoc that has been done and the chaos created by the sweeping of twenty-five feet of water over an entire city, washing away, with battering-ram force, blocks of houses, factories and trains of railway cars, and burying beneath its current more than one hundred lives.

Scene of Great Disaster at Austin, Pa.

The pictures also show the work of rescue, the clearing of the débris and the state constabulary protecting property. They show the conditions of the streets and houses, and the bereaved people. The heroic work of rescue presents a striking picture of self-sacrifice. Laborers and townspeople, bent on finding the bodies of friends or relatives, move about the destroyed town with ceaseless and indefatigable energy.

Many charitable folks have come to the rescue and their work in alleviating the suffering is a striking example of American generosity.

THE PATHE WEEKLY.

This popular and interesting innovation in the moving picture field is certainly upholding the reputation of the Pathe's for having a cameraman everywhere that anything is happening. The current weekly contains views of the disastrous flood at Austin, Pa., besides many other events of world-wide interest. The Pathe camera was on the spot as soon as the fastest train could take him there and what he did not record was not worth seeing. Another feature of National interest in a coming issue will be the funeral obsequies of the late Admiral Schley.

ATAXIA SHOWN BY CINEMATOGRAPH.

The application of motion pictures to the study of the symptoms of certain nervous diseases was recently undertaken by Siegmund Lubin, the head of the manufacturing company bearing his name, at a meeting of physicians recently in Philadelphia. The pictures were in illustration of a lecture by Dr. Theodore H. Weisenburg entitled, "The Gait, Station, Tremors and Other Symptoms of Various Forms of Nervous Diseases," given recently before an alumni association of the Medico-Chirurgical College in Philadelphia, in the clinical amphitheater. The films furnished by Mr. Lubin for the occasion were characterized as remarkable by those who were present at the meeting. There are some very interesting features in the presentation by films rather than by patients, in that they are always at command, they may be repeated, and they permit of the examination of phenomena that to the eye are transparent and fleeting. No matter how well the patient may be observed in life, there are always some items that in the review of the subject the physician wishes he had seen better. These the film catches and repeats faithfully once, a dozen times or a thousand times at the will of the investigator. The process has apparently a further great value in the historical record made and the possibility of comparing patients with others or perhaps with standards. Then again, in the change of symptoms from time to time, the cinematograph affords here the opportunity for comparison. In so fleeting and differentiated a study as symptomology, it would seem as if the motion pictures can be of the greatest aid.—Chicago Medical Recorder.

Flats overlooking airdomes have been renting well all summer despite objections of flat-owners earlier in the season. In some case rents went up. Another blessing in disguise.

DANTE'S INFERNO STEREOPTICON LECTURE.

Dante's Inferno is a classic that contains unlimited possibilities for every branch of projection work. It is one of those subjects that will live forever, and money spent in the reproduction of classical works is a better investment than putting it in subjects of more ephemeral nature.

Since "Dante's Inferno" made its appearance in motion pictures, the poem has been revived with fresh interest. The pictures have instituted a further research into the works of Dante, and at the present time his famous epic poem may be considered a live topic. There is so much to the work of Dante that the subject of the Inferno is practically inexhaustible. It has its own peculiar interest, whether presented as plain reading, or a moving picture, or a stereopticon lecture.

Realizing the large field for study in this well-known poem, Mr. A. J. Clapham has prepared a full and complete stereopticon lecture which comes at a time when the poem is being widely discussed. There is a full descriptive printed lecture accompanying a magnificent set of 77 slides. These slides are photographed from the original steel engravings of Gustave Dore's paintings, and for that reason are as authentic as it is possible for them to be. The Dore illustrations are well-known to most readers of good books, and on that account the pictures do not require a detailed description at this writing, other than to say that they are beautifully colored and enhanced in value thereby.

Any exhibitor who is looking for an interesting novelty, as well as an educational feature, will find these slides to be just the proper thing. There is no doubt but that they will interest all classes. They concern the rich and poor alike.

A representative of The World called personally at Mr. Clapham's offices and saw the slides, and it can be said that they are all that they are advertised to be and all that they should be. Mr. Clapham has removed to 130 West 37th St.

Our Theatre Menu

With a bill of fare like this placed in front of your theatre, people are bound to go in and spend their money, even though they have just had a turkey dinner elsewhere. As one of our customers wrote us,

"It Increased My Business Ten Per Cent"

And it will increase yours, Mr. Exhibitor, if you will give it a trial. What it has done for others it will certainly do for you, and you should not allow some old fogy notion to stand between you and possibly your future success, at least a great increase in business. You certainly will find, as hundreds of others have found, that this is the proper system, and that it solves the poster question for some time to come.

Write us at once for our proposition whereby we furnish you with a poster for each and every film released by the Licensed manufacturer of motion pictures, for the small sum of

INQUIRIES

Correspondents are advised that no attention will be paid inquiries which do not give the name and address of the writers. For the purpose of reply, initials or noms de plume may be used.

Inquiry as to the private affairs of photoplayers will not be answered. This includes the question as to whether or not they are married.

No inquiries of a general nature will hereafter be answered by mail and only in special cases when a stamped self-addressed envelope is enclosed. Many correspondents ask the same question and we have initiated this department to save our own time and yet help our readers when we can.

W. R.—James Kirkwood is still with the Reliance company and is appearing regularly in the films. The Reliance Company issues two reels a week and very naturally Mr. Kirkwood cannot appear in both. If you have not seen him lately it is merely one of those kinks of chance that lead to the daily murder of the Photoplay stars by ushers and piano players. Why not ask the manager of the theater you attend to get his exchange to hunt up a couple? We are unable to give titles.

H. P. C.—We are unable to advise you as to Miss Leonard's intentions, but she has returned from abroad and it is not unlikely that we shall hear presently. Keep an eye on the news columns.

T. M. G.
Alva.
S. K. H. } You, too.

V. N. J.—We do not know whether Flora Finch is the real stage name of the Vitagraph player. Just suppose that her "real" name was Sally Brown. Would her acting be any better or any worse? Such questions are not in the province of this department.

T. J.—You seem to have gotten John Bunny of the Vitagraph and John R. Cumpson of the Edison players confused.

A. D. H.—The person you mistake for S. Lubin in the pictures is Charles Brandt. In some pictures the resemblance is startling, but Brandt has more hair. Mr. Lubin unconsciously posed in the station scene of "When the Cat's Away" made about a year ago, being caught by the camera as he came from the train. That is the extent of his recent activities.

V. M. B.—Since you are the first in with the question this week—Miss Turner is not dead or away from the Vitagraph. The same for Leo Delaney and Maurice Costello, Florence Lawrence, Arthur Johnson and Mary Pickford.

C. L. K.—If you'll look on page 963 of your paper dated September 30th, you'll find "the girl who looks so much like the Thanhouser actress." This is not such a remarkable resemblance, seeing that Miss Glynn recently changed to the Lubin company. (2) The best way to sell a scenario is to pick out some company that seems to be using stories in that style and send in your scenario. You can judge the style of production by reading the film stories in each issue of the Moving Picture World, and get the addresses out of the advertisements. Send a stamped and addressed envelope for the return of the story in case it is not accepted. See answer to "V. M. B."

D. G. I.—Maurice Costello and Tefft Johnson are the two men in the Vitagraph Company's "Foraging." James Gordon had the title part in Edison's "The Sheriff." We cannot answer personal questions.

G. K. T.—See answer to "V. M. B."

George L.—We would suggest a want advertisement in this paper as being most likely to bring you what you require.

W. H. K.—We do not know what has become of "all the Pathe microscopic stuff." Doubtless more will be released as it becomes available, but this is the product of the home studios, the two establishments here being devoted to the production of purely American plays. The Pathe "Billy" is Billy Quirk, an American player with a considerable stage reputation.

A. D. C.—The Melies company is no longer in Texas, having migrated to California, riding stock and all, early in the Spring.

Davis.—The Selig "Joe and Jim" was not a steal from Hal Reid's poem, but was based on that composition by arrangement with the author.

M. S.—May Hotaling played the "mother" in Lubin's "A Question of Modesty." Elsie Glynn was the girl. See answer to "V. M. B." for Miss Lawrence. She does not work under the director who made this picture.

J. G. R.—Edwin Clarke was the good young man in Edison's "The Baby of the Boarding House." Edwin Boulden was the lazy youth.

Jake.—Your inquiry is answered in the reply to "W. R." We might add that as Mr. Kirkwood both acts and produces he cannot be expected to take part in all the productions.

Esther.—You're right in locating the Viva and Vita II as Vitagraph boats in the Harmsworth races. They are the property of J. Stuart Blackton; but don't overlook the speedy little Ethel, A. E. Smith's hydroplane that made the fast Gould yacht look like a canal boat with the tow horse backing up in a distance race across the Sound. Mr. Smith is also an officer of the Vitagraph Company.

T. Y. G.—The Richard Harding Davis stories are not written for the Edison Company, but are adapted from published stories by arrangement with the publisher. (2) Where a story is not copyrighted there still exist rights under common law. Better stick to original stories. (3) The astronomical stories might possess limited interest, but wherein would they differ from lantern slides of the same subject? The man in the moon is no photoplayer.

C. E. K.—Florence Turner was the new stenographer in the Vitagraph production by that name. Flora Finch was the girl replaced. (2) Jimmie, of the Gaumont company, is not an American. The films are imported and data as to the players is not at hand. Kenneth Casey is probably the Vitagraph boy you refer to, but he did not play "Jimmie."

K. L. E.—Your comment upon the unconvincingness of some of the letters in the films has been made before. The explanation is simple. Letters are all in one handwriting in the production of the company you single out because the chief of production believes in saving time on the screen by having the letters written by one person familiar with the work—and there is a knack in getting the letters just right for the camera. You might better have based your complaint on the practice of using script type or even the plain Roman fonts. There are arguments for and against the practice which are too long to be recited here.

H. I.—The reason that Arthur Johnson is so far behind the leaders in the "popularity contest you mention is that he is not spending his salary on votes. Popularity contests are based on the votes bought; not upon the following of the contestants.

Bausch & Lomb Optical Co.

NEW YORK WASHINGTON CHICAGO SAN FRANCISCO
LONDON ROCHESTER, N.Y. FRANKFORT

G. K. E.—Frankenstein as a film subject was done by the Edison company something more than a year ago, but only in one reel. Most companies prefer to make their own arrangements of standard works ,and we believe that you would only waste time and postage. At any rate, query the companies before you send on the script, enclosing stamped cover for reply.

B. W. D.—The Selig release, "Back to the Primitive," was made in Florida, not in Africa. The flora is much the same, sufficiently so to be entirely convincing. Kathryn Williams played the part. Florence Turner had the lead in "A Tale of Two Cities." The placement of the scenes was a matter of technique necessitated by the fact that in the story the parts first shown in film are told in explanation. In picture it is better to have them appear in chronological order to avoid confusion. We most assuredly do not regard the change as inartistic—quite to the contrary.

B. J.—Frank Crane was the Silas Marner of the Thanhouser film. The Biograph Company has also made the production. The Vitagraph title was Silas Warner, a difference of a letter only, but an entirely different story.

George.—"The Fall of Troy" and "The Inferno" were not produced by the same company. The former was done by the Itala and the latter by the Milano. The latter company does not regularly release in America.

C. B. B.—There were two Atlantic City stories made this season by the Lubin producers. The first was "A Gay Time at Atlantic City," already released. "A Hot Time in Atlantic City," originally done three summers ago, was made again the early part of September.

B. W. S.—Owen Moore and King Baggott are the leading men with the Imp. Arthur Johnson was with Reliance (not Imp) before he went to Lubin. Henry Walthall was the boy in the Reliance film you mention. He was formerly with Pathe Freres. Maurice Costello has been steadfast in his preference for the Vitgraph. Leo Costello is still with the Vitagraph. It just happened he has not figured in many recent films.

K. T. T.—The outlaw in "Archibald the Hero" (Lubin) is William Louis, and not Lewis, as it is generally spelled. He is an Italian and has been with the Lubin company for a number of years.

L. S. H.—Guy Coombs was the young husband in "The Baggage Coach Ahead." He is not now with the Edison players. (2) There are several companies making a specialty of advertising films and both independent and licensed companies have made them. They do not, as a rule, employ scenarios.

S. L. G.—We do not agree with the suggestion conveyed in your letter of inquiry. Pictured operations are not always unconvincing. Many of them have been staged by graduate surgeons.

SPECIAL NOTICE: On Friday, October 6th, the Edison Company will release a three reel production, consisting of a dramatized version of the great story, "Foul Play," by Charles Reade. Exhibitors running a three or four reel program are in a position to make these releases the subject of a "special feature night with lecture." In view of the decided successes scored by artistic films of greater length, both in moving picture houses and in the big theaters of the country, it seems quite probable that such a feature will prove a source of profit. I have prepared a set of press notices and matter for announcement slides, which will be sent to every exhibitor who wishes to have them in connection with my services as lecturer. If unable to come myself, I am in a position to send a competent substitute, but will endeavor to answer all calls personally as far as possible. Send applications at earliest possible moment.

KALEM.

THE COLLEEN BAWN (Oct. 16) (Reel 1).—In all Ireland there existed no more beautiful estate than Torc Cregan, the baronial home of the Cregans. But with all its natural beauty, a shadow, in the form of a heavy mortgage, hung over the estate. Mrs. Cregan, therefore, laid careful plans that her son, Hardress, should marry Anne Chute, whose fortune would lift the indebtedness of the family.

But her plans were shattered when Hardress met Eily O'Connor, "The Colleen Bawn." Hardress wooed the simple maid and quietly married her. It was easy to persuade her to keep the secret—she did not aspire to a place by his side in the world.

Knowing nothing of the nuptials, Mrs. Cregan resented the attentions of Kyrle Daly to Anne and informed her son, who shocked her by his indifference.

Squire Corrigan, the holder of the mortgage, offered Mrs. Cregan two alternatives before he foreclosed—she must either marry him or secure Anne's written consent to marry Hardress. He told her of Hardress' meetings with the Colleen, which the young man admitted, making no mention of his marriage.

Danny Mann, with his misshapen body, was a faithful servant of Hardress, and formed a clumsy plan of taking a note to Anne, given him by Eily for Hardress, and stated it was for Daly, whom he was to row across the lake to meet the Colleen. Anne's confidence in Daly was therefore shaken.

Myles, a young rustic, who also loved Eily, paid her a visit, along with Father Tom. Hardress came in, while all but the Colleen were in a back room, and begged her for the marriage certificate. In her great love she delivered it to him for destruction, but Myles stepped in and secured a return of the paper. When Hardress had departed, Father Tom had Eily promise him solemnly that the marriage lines would never leave her hands again.

(Reel 2).—Danny Mann, meeting his master after the latter's ineffectual interview with Eily, tells Hardress, if he will give him his glove as a token, he will make away with the Colleen. This infuriates Hardress so that he handles his poor servant unmercifully. Nonetheless, the devoted Danny goes to Mrs. Cregan, before whom he lays his plan, and secures the glove, thinking she has influenced her son to give his approval, whereas she has taken it without the knowledge of Hardress. Danny now meets the Colleen and tells her she is to meet her husband that night in a lonely spot on the lake. Thither he conducts her, and, taking her by surprise, throws her into the water. Myles, who secretly conducts a whiskey still nearby, heard the commotion and taking his gun, hurries to the scene, where he shoots Danny and rescues the Colleen.

(Reel 3).—Danny manages to crawl to his home, and, burning with fever, becomes delirious. In his ravings he tells of the supposed murder of the Colleen and Shelah, his mother, hurries out to secure Father Tom. Squire Corrigan, the moneylender, happens in and secrets himself, overhearing and writing down the confession which Danny makes to Father Tom. Old Sheelah finds the torn and water-soaked cloak of the Colleen at the shore and shows it to Hardress, both concluding that Eily has committed suicide. There is now no impediment in the way of Hardress' forced marriage with Anne, who has paid the mortgage. He confesses to her that he was married to the Colleen.

Father Tom, thinking Myles knows something of the affair, goes to the latter's hut and there finds Eily, who has escaped death by Myles' timely rescue.

Corrigan gathers the soldiers, takes Sheelah as a witness and marches to the place where Hardress and Anne are about to be married. He confronts Hardress with Danny's confession, which reads that Danny committed the deed at his master's instigation and received Hardress' glove as a token of agreement. The heart-broken mother confesses that it was she who delivered the glove. Just then the door opens and Father Tom and Myles lead in the Colleen. She comes to the waiting arms of her husband, who now openly acknowledges her. The marriage ceremony with Anne is stopped and the plotting Corrigan is humbled.

DANIEL BOONE'S BRAVERY (Oct. 18).—The horses of the settlers are turned loose, with bells about their necks, that they may be easily located. Indians capture the horses and remove the bells. In the morning, the Indians, crouching in the grass, tinkle the bells and decoy the settlers, who are slain. Boone, sitting before his cabin with his boy, hears the shots and hastens to the rescue. He is captured by two Indians and led away a prisoner. After a fierce struggle, Boone overcomes his captors and escapes. He rushes home, followed by the redskins, and takes his son into the loft of a tobacco shed. As the two Indians creep up, the boy shoots one and Boone throws powdered tobacco into the eyes of the other.

Covering his son with tobacco leaves, Boone goes out, but is pursued by the Indian, who has wiped out his eyes and overtakes the daring settler, leading him to the Indian camp. There a great pow wow takes place as Boone has long been hated and feared by the Indians.

In the night Boone, with hands and feet bound, rolls into the fire and burns off his bonds. He loses no time in covering the ground to the settlement, hotly pursued by the furious redskins. With a few brave companions, Boone crawls into the loft and brings out his son, who has not dared to show himself, and the party barely have time to reach the stockade before the whole tribe of Indians sweeps down upon them. A sharp fight takes place, in which the Indians are repulsed and peace again reigns in the valley.

THE MESQUITE'S GRATITUDE (Oct. 20).—When Mesquite, a young Indian girl, passed through the ranch, it was the signal for a number of inconsiderate young ranchmen to gather about and taunt her. She was therefore much relieved when Kid appeared on the scene, telling the men in no uncertain language what he thought of their conduct. There seemed to be a particularly rough element on the ranch at that time, for within a few days after befriending Mesquite, Kid was called upon to take the part of a young white woman who suffered insult at the hands of the rowdies. This time, however, Kid did not escape without a quarrel, in which he roundly punished the main offender, leaving him in an unconscious condition. Kid thought it well to "make himself scarce," until peace was restored and hurried away from the scene of trouble, pursued by the sheriff.

Then it was that Mesquite displayed her gratitude. Encountering Kid in his flight, she formed a clever plan of hiding him in a tree until the sheriff's party had passed, when she conducted him to her camp and secured the chief's permission to hide him. Kid sends the girl with a note to his friends, inquiring if the coast is clear, and she conducts them to his hiding-place. The roughs awaken to their ill-bred conduct and resolve to cause Kid no more annoyance. He is therefore permitted to return unmolested to the ranch, but it is not long before he again visits the Indian camp, this time to lead Mesquite away to become his bride.

LUBIN.

THE MANIAC (Oct. 16).—This story opens in an insane asylum where two of the inmates, Sam and Johns, are seen mopping the floor. Johns picked up a newspaper and noticed the engagement of a Miss Dora Elsmore and Mr. Harry Danen. The article stated that Miss Elsmore was an orphan. Johns immediately conceived a scheme whereby he would appear as the long lost father of Miss Elsmore.

He and Sam escaped from the Asylum and in due time Johns appeared before Dora and proclaimed himself her long lost parent. Being a dutiful daughter, she prepared a comfortable room for him and determined to take care of him for the rest of his life. Dora wrote to Harry, explaining the family disgrace and breaking their engagement. Of course, this letter brought Harry post haste. He begged Dora to allow him to investigate and discover whether this man really was her father. Johns overheard the conversation and filled with maniacal rage, secured a butcher knife, intending to kill Harry.

In the chase they met Sam, whom Johns felled with one blow. He also overtook Harry and there was a terrific fight, which ended only when the guards from the asylum arrived. Johns was taken back while Harry rejoined Dora, told her of his experience and urged her to marry him. Dora was still reluctant because now she believed the taint of insanity was in her family. Finally the whole scheme was explained and, of course, the wedding bells rang.

THE CURE OF JOHN DOUGLAS (Oct. 18).—Drink had secured such a strong hold on John Douglas that it threatened to ruin a life which was most promising. He had a brilliant mind for the law.

He was in love with Ruth Boyton. One day when Ruth was out walking with another suitor, Henry Briston, they met John, who was intoxicated. This settled all Ruth's doubts, and shortly afterward she was married to Briston.

The two men were the best of friends, and Briston often tried to break Douglas of his besetting sin, offering him a place in his law firm if he would only quit drink. Finally, when all efforts had failed, Briston and some of his friends determined on a scheme, which they believed would succeed.

One evening, when they knew he had been drinking heavily, Briston called at his apartments and begged him to sober up. Douglas became angry and later fell into a drunken stupor. Briston telephoned to his friends, and they soon arrived to put the scheme into operation. They daubed his shirt bosom with red paint, giving the appearance of blood. Then they placed a revolver in the unconscious hand of Douglas. After a time Douglas awoke. He saw the form of his friend apparently dead and beheld the revolver in his own hand. He was half crazed with the thought that he was a murderer. He quickly placed the body in a large trunk, and then wandered out into the street still dazed. There he met some of the friends who were in the plot, and decided to make a clean breast of it.

When he learned that the whole thing was a plan to get him to stop drinking, and that Briston was still alive and well, he was overcome with joy, and from that day he never drank another drop.

GIT A HOSS (Oct. 19).—Pretty Mary Conway was the belle of the town. Tom and Jim were both striving for her favor, but Tom had the advantage because he owned a rubber-tired buggy and a span of dapple grays, but Jim's day was coming. One day he received a circular advertising an automobile. He lost no time in ordering one of the machines and when it arrived he promptly took a spin around to Mary's home. That fair girl was just about being helped by Tom into his buggy. Tom might as well have had an ice wagon for all the attraction it was to Mary. She made a pretty excuse to him. Then Jim had the delight to hand her into his new machine, Mary having suggested that Tom could take her Aunt in the buggy.

Away spun happy Jim, with Tom and Aunty following at a slower pace. All went well for a few miles and then something went wrong with the automobile. It refused to budge another foot. Jim consulted his instruction book and found that the thing to do was to crawl under the car and tighten up the universal joint.

While he was thus engaged Tom drove up and suggested to Mary that she give Aunty a chance to ride in the machine, which good-hearted Mary agreed to. They drove off and when Tom had completed his operations under the automobile, he came out only to face Aunty. Then he collapsed.

TOBACCO INDUSTRY (Oct. 21).—This educational film shows the different stages of tobacco culture, from the planting of the seeds to the finished cigar. The process shows the planting of the seed, transplanting the tender young sprouts, hoeing, cultivating, placing the matured leaves upon sticks to hang in sheds to dry, trimming the leaves, rolling the cigars, labeling, boxing and sealing the boxes for shipment.

HER EXCLUSIVE HAT (Oct. 21).—The milliner said it was a grand creation of the most fashionable designer of the Rue de la Paix or the Place Ven Dome or some other swell Parisian millinery shop. Oh, how proud Mrs. Aitkens was as she walked along the street. In the distance Mrs. Aitkens discerned a hat, the counterpart of hers. As she drew closer she saw that the hat was worn by a lady of the Ethiopian race. Both women eyed each other with the greatest haughtiness as they passed. Rip, rip. Mr. Aitkens beheld his wife tearing the $40 bonnet to shreds.

WILLIE'S CONSCIENCE (Oct. 21).—Willie was given a penny, with which he bought a stick of candy. He remembered that his little sister's bank was full of pennies. He ran back home and extracted a penny. Then with guilty conscience he ran back to purchase the rosy apple. Just as he was about to hand the Italian his penny the fruit vender changed into a policeman. Willie ran. Horrors! every man he passed was suddenly and mysteriously changed into a policeman seeking for little Willie. He finally arrived home and hid. When he felt the danger was passed he replaced the penny in the bank and then was comforted by his mother.

VITAGRAPH.

THE FIGHTING SCHOOLMASTER (Oct. 16).—Before the Civil War, George Harris, a Yankee school teacher, takes charge of a southern country school. He is attracted by Nellie Gardner, his prettiest pupil, but his attentions are resented by her big brother Phil, also a pupil. They quarrel and a fight ensues, in which the teacher gets the better of Phil. Nellie will not forgive Harris for striking her brother.

Word is received in the village that President Lincoln has called for troops for the Union army. Harris, in sympathy with the north, is pointed out as a Yankee by Phil, to the town's people. The crowd attack the schoolmaster, but through the intervention of Nellie, he passes on unmolested.

Phil enlists in the Confederate army. The school is closed and Harris joins the Union forces. Nellie refuses to bid him goodby before he leaves for the front.

Four years pass. Phil is now an officer in the Confederate army, while Harris wears shoulder straps in the Union army. In a battle in which the Union forces are victors, Phil falls wounded into a nearby stream. Harris, who sees him fall, plunges into the water and rescues him. After the battle, word is received that the war is over. Harris is granted permission to take Phil home, which he does. Phil tells his sister that he owes his life to Harris. Surprised and pleased, she thanks Harris. He tells her of his love and asks her to marry him. She replies to this by saying that he must ask Phil's consent. It is readily granted and Nellie is only too happy to acknowledge her love for Harris.

They will fill your house to capacity every performance.

The Annual Mardi Gras at Coney Island will give the world at large an opportunity of seeing this unique fête at the height of its festivities.

We next see the start of the aviators at Sheepshead Bay, and the flight of the intrepid Rogers on his way from New York to San Francisco.

The foregoing are supplemented by a visualization of the last grand union of the Grand Army of the Republic, at Rochester, New York. This is probably the last gathering together of the veterans who fought in the Civil War.

A very pretty picture, which will be pleasing to see, introduced by way of variety, are the Diving Girls, at Sheepshead Bay, New York. There are other matters of equal interest and attractiveness in this popular and entertaining magazine of current events and exceptional doings.

SELECTING HIS HEIRESS (Oct. 18).—Uncle Doughbags, a rich old bachelor, has so much money it is a question of some concern to him. He has three nieces, next of kin. In order to become better acquainted with them and learn their fitness for handling such a large inheritance, he pays them a visit. When the girls hear that he is coming, the two younger nieces, who are two overgrown twin "boobies," decide to win their uncle's favor by being very attentive to him, and naturally suppose that he will be very much impressed by their sensitiveness and sympathetic natures. On the other hand, their older sister is of a very literary, chilly temperament, and is too much absorbed in her own interests to show any special interest in her uncle or his affairs. She does not seem to care.

Uncle Doughbags is received with much "gush" and demonstration by the two "kid" sisters, while the elder sister receives him in a very matter-of-fact way. The over demonstrative manner in which the two younger girls force their attentions upon him and their readiness to cry over anything that displeases him, gets on their uncle's nerves, and the quiet indifference of the elder sister makes him feel very much disconcerted, so, between them all, he is entirely undecided as to who is the most deserving of his wealth. He consults a lawyer, and is told the only way he can decide is to die. Uncle Doughbags makes up his mind to do this and makes all arrangements for a respectable demise. The effusive twins give one outburst of grief and then get busy, asking about their uncle's will and speculating on the good times they will have with the money he has left them.

The uncle takes all this in and makes a mental note of it. The elder sister respectfully evidences her grief by subdued tears and a sincere sorrow for the loss of her generous and kind uncle, whom she speaks of in endearing terms, mentioning his many good traits. She makes preparations for his funeral with decency and propriety, showing no interest as to how he has willed his fortune, in fact, caring little and knowing less about it. Uncle Doughbags "is wise," and it does not take him very long to make up his mind as to whom he shall bequeath his possessions. He suddenly comes to life, explains his pretended death, and declares his heiress to be the elder sister.

THE CABIN BOY (Oct. 20).—Young Captain Brisk, just as he is about to leave on a long trip, receives a letter from his sister, saying: "My dear Ernest:—I am so glad you are coming to see me on your next voyage, as you say your marriage will not change your love. I thank you for the money. With love, Your sister Ruth." In opening it, he cuts through the last phrase, "Your sister Ruth," and after reading the letter, in putting it back in the envelope, drops the main part on the floor, carrying the signature away with him.

After he leaves, his wife discovers the letter on the floor. At once she decides that her husband is unfaithful to her and that he has an "affinity" in some other port. She makes up her mind to leave the home forever. She writes a note to him which she places on the table, together with the letter which she found after his departure.

Sixteen months later the Captain returns and finds his once happy home deserted, discovering the note from his wife on the table, and the explanation. He is distracted. He makes every effort to find his wife and child, but cannot trace them. He leaves on another voyage, from which he does not return for twelve years.

The Captain's little girl, grown up, tries to be of assistance to her mother and conceives the idea of dressing like a boy, selling newspapers and securing employment wherever it is possible. Running about the docks, she sees a sign, "Cabin Boy Wanted," makes application for the position, secures it, and sends word to her mother. In a spirit of fun, the sailors get her to walk the string-piece of the vessel, from which she falls overboard. The captain hears her cries, jumps in and saves her. Meanwhile, Ella's mother receives the note, rushes down along the wharves until she comes to the brig, goes aboard and finds her child in the embrace of her husband. He takes from his trunk the torn letter and places the two pieces together, showing her that it was from his sister. She acknowledges her unjust mistake and once more they are united and happy.

LADY GODIVA (Oct. 21).—Earl Leofric, of Coventry, England, placed a grievous tax upon his townspeople, who have already been so heavily levied upon that they are on the verge of starvation. Lady Godiva, the Earl's wife, pleads with him to revoke the tax and relieve the sufferings of the people. He answers in a spirit half in jest, and whole in earnest, thinking that she will not agree to such a proposition, that if she will ride naked through the town, he will repeal the tax. Her heart is wrung with the sufferings of her people, and she is neither contented in mind, nor easy in spirit, until she replies she will pay the price of their freedom and perform the undertaking, cost what it may.

She sends heralds forth through the town, saying that she will free the people from their bonds according to the edict of her husband, by riding unclothed through the town. Nature has blessed her with an abundant growth of hair, which hangs far below her waist and covers her as with a mantle. But notwithstanding, a notice is posted that at the hour of midday, on the day set for the payment of her debt of devotion, that all the people shall stay within closed doors and no eye shall look upon her.

Her task done, the debt paid, she returns to her home and only one curious person disobeys the injunction that "no eye shall look upon her." That person was ever afterward called "Peeping Tom," and in punishment for his disobedience, he is struck blind and Lady Godiva is worshiped as a saint unto this day in the minds of the grateful inhabitants of Coventry.

SELIG.

MAKING A MAN OF HIM (Oct. 16).—Bertie Bouner, a clerk, marries Sallie Morgan, from the country, and wishing to make a good impression on his wife's family, takes them for a day's outing. This so depletes his pocket-book, that he asks his father-in-law for a loan of $100.00. Later, through love of gambling, Bertie neglects his business, and is discharged, while his wife returns to her home in the country. But Bertie has reckoned without Sallie's father, who immediately goes to the city to have a settlement with Bertie.

Bertie is thrashed by the irate father and then taken to the farm and put to "doing chores," much to the delight of Pete and Ike, Sallie's brothers.

Three months later, Bertie has paid his debt to Mr. Morgan, and realizing that "life on the farm" is not so bad after all, he decides to stay. His coming to his senses effects a reconciliation with his wife.

ON SEPARATE PATHS (Oct. 17).—Widow Maitland's two sons, Ralph and Steve, after being tattooed by an old sailor, return home, where both receive a thrashing. Ralph resents it and runs away.

Fifteen years pass. Steve and his mother go West, where he is elected sheriff. Ralph comes to the very county in which his brother and mother are living. He has drifted from bad to worse, and after a poker game, he suggests to his pals that they go to a dance in a neighboring town. Arriving there, a quarrel takes place in which a young man is shot by Ralph, who makes his escape.

The sheriff starts out with a posse after the murder. He is finally overtaken, and wounded, and is captured. After being taken back to the town, his wounds are cared for and during that process, his tattoo is discovered, and Steve recognizes his brother. All the medical attendance at hand is given him, but he sinks, and only regains consciousness long enough to ask forgiveness of Steve, and say goodby to his mother.

HOW THEY STOPPED THE RUN ON THE BANK (Oct. 19).—Rumor has it that the Forest City State Bank, one of the oldest and most conservative institutions in the country, is hard pressed for cash. The news spreads like wildfire and a run is imminent. Money has been wired for but the question of the moment is to quiet the frantic crowd until it arrives. Mr. Church, the president, faces ruin and disgrace if the run starts. Quite by chance, young Dick Thatcher, the cashier, and Dorothy Church, his fiancée, hit upon a novel idea to quell the panic. They secure a ferocious live lion and his tamer from the circus, which is in town, and when the doors of the bank are thrown open to the surging crowd, they forget all about their deposited money in a wild effort to get as far away from the bank as possible

The ensemble in this delightful comedy was composed of members of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of Illinois. Over two hundred of them acted in this unique production.

HIS BETTER SELF (Oct. 20).—Nellie and Jim are happy, care free, country lovers. But in their case, as in all others the world over, true love refuses to run smooth. The shadow that crosses their paradise in this particular instance is the advent of handsome John Crowell, a city chap. John comes to town after a siege of illness, and in the course of time he meets Nellie. The girl finds herself making comparisons between Jim and the city man, and Jim suffers—until the crucial test comes. "All is fair in love and war," it is said, and this is demonstrated when Nellie and Jim approach the rough spots in their country drama. Love wins in the end.

ESSANAY.

A FALSE SUSPICION (Oct. 17).—A spendthrift wife is rebuked by her husband for her extravagance, but despite his entreaties to pay less for her gowns, the mania for dress is irresistible and he is finally compelled to tell her that he will no longer be responsible for her debts. She is besieged by creditors and after failing to borrow money without her husband finding it out, she appeals to a gentleman friend of the family. He loans her the money and later, her husband finding receipts signed by his friend, demands an explanation from his wife, whom he unjustly suspects of too close an intimacy with the friend. Matters, however, are happily adjusted and the wife promises never to be extravagant again.

THEIR TINY BABIES (Oct. 19).—A decidedly novel comedy photoplay which will prove exceptionally pleasing to the children. The adventures of the tiny babies are decidedly amusing.

'TIS BETTER TO HAVE LOVED AND LOST (Oct. 19).—Pretty Kitty sends Smaxon and Jimstack, her two unwelcome suitors, off to await her under the old oak tree when she will elope with them. (Of course, neither knows of each other.) Kitty then elopes with Tom. Smaxon and Jimstack do not realize how lucky they have been until one day they peep into Parker's window and find him scrubbing the floor and she reading a novel. They then agree that "'tis better to have loved and lost"—and so does Tom!

DR. BILL'S PATIENT (Oct. 20).—It is love at first sight with Dr. Bill and Cynthia, when they meet for the first time on the street. Later, when the Bingle poodle is ill, its distracted mistress asks that Dr. Bill be sent for. When the doctor arrives to treat "Violet," who the note leads him to believe is the pretty daughter, he is surprised and indignant at finding that "Violet" is a canine. Though his professional pride is injured, Cynthia's charms win him over. Later, when asked to call again at the Bingle home to treat "Cynthia, who has been injured," he goes prepared with a complete veterinary outfit, only to be again surprised in finding that "Cynthia" is the pretty daughter. Cynthia then explains that she has not been hurt at all but—Dr. Bill then sees his opportunity, takes Cynthia in his arms, and soon wins her father over.

A WESTERN REDEMPTION (Oct. 21).—Tom Perkins, a Chicago youth, is arrested, charged with being one of the carbarn bandits, to whom is attributed a series of bold robberies. The disgraced parents also suffer for their son's crimes, the elder Perkins being thrown out of a job, and they are forced to leave their rented cottage, on account of the bad character of their son. Perkins and his wife then go West to begin life anew. Tom, liberated from prison, goes West and becomes a bandit. He and his pal, Steve Ray, rob an express office in a general store, which is in charge of Tom's father, though the fact is unknown to Tom. Later, when he discovers that he has robbed his own father, he forces Ray to accompany him to the sheriff's office, where Tom confesses and asks that they be made to pay for their crime. In later years, when Tom is again released, he seeks out his parents, and having given proof of his reformation, obtains their blessing.

BIOGRAPH.

THE UNVEILING (Oct. 16).—The boy, who is the idol of his widowed mother, returns from college with a collegiate record she is justly proud of. To mark the occasion his boyhood sweetheart and her mother come to spend a few days. The too-indulgent mother, however, is blind to the fact that the boy is spending most of his evenings in full dress, which should have told her that Bohemian society was engaging his attention. A showgirl, who learns that he will soon come into great wealth, determines to win him. Unsophisticated as he is, he is an easy prey. A friend of the family warns the mother of her boy's danger, which she is loath to believe until positive proof is presented. Pleadings are in vain, for the boy is fascinated, and so the sorrowing mother, feeling she has lost all that she has lived for, determines upon self-destruction and is prevented only by the timely appearance of her visiting friend, who devises the plan that awakens the boy. She has the mother pretend suicide on account of the loss of fortune. This shows the boy the true nature and design of the object of his infatuation.

THE ADVENTURES OF BILLY (Oct. 19).—Little Billy, the bootblack, finding luck against him, decides to move to some other town. To do this he must walk, as he hasn't the wherewith for a railroad ticket. While trudging through the country, he falls into the hands of a couple of sinister-looking tramps, and they at once, by threats, force him to beg for them. A day or so later, the tramps hold up an old man, and while procuring his money throw him down with such force as to unintentionally kill him. Panic-stricken at their awful deed, they feel that the boy's knowledge of the affair will prove disastrous for them, and so they decide to get rid of him. Through the sagacity of a dog the boy is saved and the tramps are captured.

ECLIPSE.

ORDERED TO MOVE ON (Oct. 18).—Showing the adventures of a young musical genius following the death of his father.

After he has met with many rebuffs his ability is recognized by a great violinist and his success assured through the master's patronage.

MADEIRA, PORTUGAL (Oct. 18).—A picture of great natural interest and scenic novelty, illustrating the principal beauty spots of this favorite health and tourist resort.

Funchal—Arrival in the bay. Wonderful surf effects.

The Beach—Unloading and transferring baggage.

Market and Street Scenes—Bullock drawn vehicles on the cobble stones. The customs house. Quaint scenes in the native quarter. Fruit packing and traction. Panorama of the Cintra from the Heights. The Rabacal waterfall, one of the principal attractions of Madeira.

Pineapple Growing—The largest pine-house in the world.

Wicker Workers—The chair industry fully demonstrated.

DONE BROWN (Oct. 17).—George, who has been married two years, plans to attend a masked ball without the knowledge of Bernice, his wife. She however, learns of his scheme, and after failing to keep him at home by many wifely attentions, she masks as a domino and in haste follows George to the ball.

At the dance she attracts his attention and accepts his escort to her home only on condition that he be blindfolded during the journey thither. When on their entry into his own home, he tears the bandage from his eyes. His attitude is best described by the words of the title: "Done Brown."

A FAIRYLAND OF FROST AND SNOW (Oct. 17).—A curious and exceptional film aptly described by the title. It introduces positively the finest winter scenes ever shown to the patrons of moving pictures.

Roads, fields and forests fairly buried in ermine, every twig and bough outlined in purest white.

GAUMONT.

THE MASKED HUNTSMAN (Oct. 21).—A game warden is fired upon by a hooded huntsman who is trespassing.

The same evening the warden's daughter dons a hood similar to that worn by the poacher, and unknown to her father starts to keep an appointment with her sweetheart to whom the fond parent objects.

The old man, thinking she is his mysterious enemy, fires upon and seriously wounds his daughter. As a pleasing sequel, the sad accident has the effect of developing a strong friendship between the father and the youth of his daughter's choice.

OPENING FLOWERS (Oct. 21).—Another of the excellent flower series which has grown so popular with the American audience because of their realistic portrayal, artistic grouping, delicacy of coloring and general interest.

MELIES.

THE CROSS OF PEARLS (Oct. 19).—Each morning and evening the villagers receive Father Anselm's blessing, administered with the beautiful, time honored Cross of Pearls. Each morning, after the blessing, Jose and his sweetheart meet and talk and love. And each morning Gabriel sees the girl of his passions paying more and more attention to his hated rival, Jose.

Jose proposes and is accepted, while Gabriel is rejected. Jose's brother, the Padre Antone, performs the marriage ceremony, and presents to Jose a beautiful silk handkerchief, which is later lost, but found by Gabriel.

Gabriel, penniless, conceives to steal the Cross of Pearls. As he approaches the Grotto, Father Anselm surprises him, and there follows a struggle which proves fatal to the monk. The crime was committed with Jose's silk handkerchief.

To the horror of Padre Antone, Gabriel confesses to him the deed that may mean death to his own brother. Upon being begged to give himself up to the authorities, Gabriel smiles wickedly, defiantly, self-satisfied, knowing well that the Padre cannot give up the secrets of the confessional, even when his own brother is involved.

Scene from "The Cross of Pearls" (Melies).

Circumstantial evidence convicts Jose and he is condemned to die. But conscience, a factor Gabriel had not counted upon, began to play its part. The vision of Father Anselm haunted his dreams, and the Cross of Pearls appeared ever before him. He was going gradually mad and was terrified lest Jose should be hung before he could make the truth known. The tension was too great. He gasped the truth and expired at the very place where the execution of an innocent man would have taken place but a moment later.

PATHE.

THE GAMBLER'S DREAM (Oct. 16).—A gambler, in the good old days, when gambling was at its height, and every gentleman spent his evenings at the table, leaves his wife at home with their child, while he goes to the Casino. Here he is ruined. Coming home in despair, he falls asleep upon the library table. He is visited with terrible dreams; he sees himself again in the gaming hall. He loses, and, the winner leaving the hall, he follows him and commits a crime to get more money with which to satisfy his abnormal craving for excitement. He is subsequently arrested and thrown into jail. Then he awakes, but the dream has had its effect and to a joyful wife and a happy child he swears never again to gamble.

THE RANCH GIRL'S TERRIBLE MISTAKE (Oct. 18).—The daughter of a ranch owner is in love with one of the cowpunchers, but her father refuses his consent; in consequence, she runs away with him and for the time they are lost to her parents. Ultimately the father receives an anonymous letter, telling him that his daughter and her husband are keeping a saloon within a few miles of his ranch. He seeks them out and attacks the cowboy. The daughter, failing to recognize her father, shoots him. Others see the deed and the sheriff comes and arrests her, but the husband takes the blame upon himself. Just how the story ends, it would be a shame to tell, as much of the piquancy of the tale rests in its denouement.

THE RENEGADE BROTHER (Oct. 19).—In Old Mexico, a father has two sons, one beloved and the other one less so. As is usual in such cases, the son upon whom all the affection is lavished is of little account, and finally he becomes so unbearably bad that his father has to drive him from home, in spite of his great love for him. Jose, the bad son, has one more trick in his pack of cards, he runs away with his brother's sweetheart. Years pass and Tony has become a priest, while Jose has gone from bad to worse, and finally he and his wife and little child have sunk to the lowest depths of degradation. One day Jose, pursued by a howling mob, seeking for vengeance against this thieving drunkard, runs into the arms of Tony, his brother, who, garbed in his priest's gown, protects him from the violence of the mob. The story ends with a touching picture of Jose's promise to his brother to make a desperate struggle to regain his self respect.

A TRIP DOWN THE MAGDAPIS RIVER (Oct. 20).—Our party leaves the heights near the source of the river in long, dugout canoes. For the first few miles the trip is uneventful, except for the magnificent scenery and the wild mountains rearing their magnificent heads high into the azure above us. Soon, however, the faint sound of the roaring waters of the first rapids reach our ears, and with a tremor of fearful expectation, we feel ourselves rushing forward, faster and faster, with the current of the stream. Soon we see the white water ahead and in a moment we find ourselves dashing through the seething mass of foam that dashes over the cruel rocks, which seem to reach from their resting places to catch us in their terrible jaws. In some places the going is very rough, and it is necessary for our guides to get out into the water and guide the boat by hand. The thrill of the trip and the magnificence of the scenery makes this an event never to be forgotten.

A PURITAN COURTSHIP (Oct. 21).—In old New England, in the days of witchcraft, the austere Puritans looker askant on anything that resembled magic, and Carlos, as the stranger in Gloucester, who by simple means cures a young girl of her indisposition, wins the enmity of the populace and the love of his patient. Carlos is tried for witchcraft, and condemned to be banished, with the further injunction that if he should return he should be burned at the stake. Ruth Windsor, the following day, seeking her lover, and failing to find him, throws herself in despair into the sea. This act is seen by Carlos, who rescues her, and returns her to a spot near her home. He is seen, arrested and re-tried, and about to be burned at the stake, when a message from the governor of the colony arrives, repealing the laws against witchcraft.

The Iroquois Theatre Fire

at Chicago in 1903 will never be forgotten because of the terrible, needless, inexcusable sacrifice of 596 lives. Same old story of a panic-mad audience piling upon each other in the vain effort to escape through fire-doors that would not open. The Von Duprin Self-Releasing Fire Exit Latch opens fire-doors instantly at the slightest pressure on a solid bar stretching across the door, about waist high. This device has never failed—it cannot fail. Try it and see why. Try it now. A day's delay may cost hundreds of lives. The demonstration will cost you nothing. Catalog?

EDISON.

AN OLD SWEETHEART OF MINE (Oct. 17).—A nicely furnished room with the moon showing through the window, a man of middle age with slightly silvered hair, everything indicating comfort. Lighting his pipe the man settles himself comfortably, picking up idly an old photograph album. Soon his interest is aroused.

The scene fades into the laughing face of a sweet young girl. Musing, the man goes to the window.

The scene fades into the moon-lit lawn with a woman and three happy children playing and singing. Still the fascination of the old sweetheart is strong, the past rising in visions before him.

The country boy and girl are seen through the curling smoke of the pipe and fireplace.

The young man and young woman are in one of nature's fairest scenes. He is to be a great composer and she listens rapturously to his eloquence. But visions cannot last forever. Suddenly the man is recalled to the present as

"Now my dream is broken by a step upon the stair
And the door is softly opened and—my wife is standing there."

With her back to the audience she stands in almost an accusing attitude. He gives up his pipe and then slowly shows her the album, confessing his love even now for that old sweetheart. She takes it, faces to the front for the first time, and he turns

"To greet the living presence of that old sweetheart of mine."

The girl of the album, of the visions and his wife are one and the same. Slowly the picture fades as they come together.

MIKE'S HERO (Oct. 18).—Mike, the plumber, is ordered to solder the leaking pipes of a motor boat and accidentally falls headlong into the lake. Being unable to swim, his lusty cries for help bring a tramp, who rescues him with a boat hook. Mike rewards the tramp by taking him home, feeding him and giving him his best and only suit of clothes, while he himself is obliged to go about in his overalls.

In more ways than one the tramp takes advantage of Mike's kindness, imposing on him and making himself a general nuisance around the house, all of which Mike cannot resent because he owes his life to him. He even goes so far as to become attentive to Mike's sweetheart. This is the last straw—poor Mike becomes despondent and decides to commit suicide by drowning. He goes to the very place where the tramp rescued him from a watery grave and deliberately jumps in, but to his surprise and amazement finds shallow water, hardly up to his waist. It now dawns upon him that the ungrateful tramp did not save his life after all. Accordingly he goes home, kicks the tramp out, becomes reconciled to his sweetheart, and once more happiness and peace reign supreme in Mike's home.

A CONSPIRACY AGAINST THE KING (Oct. 20).—Cicely and young Sir Walter are very fond of one another, but owing to the political differences of Walter and her father, they are obliged to meet secretly. At one of these meetings Walter confides to her that he is about to embark on a dangerous mission for his party, which is in opposition to the King, and that if he is taken with the treasonable papers in his possession, it means certain death. He is deaf to all pleas from Cicely and departs, promising to be with her at a certain inn on his way.

Walter meets his fellow conspirators and obtains the message. Unknown to them, however, a spy has discovered them and hurries away and informs Sir Charles, Cicely's father, of their plans. He at once sends his men out to try to catch the messenger. Cicely overhears this and resolves to warn Walter, and, mounting her horse, spurs on to the inn. Here she is disappointed. No one is there but Richard Ryder, known as Galloping Dick, a knight of the road, a merry rascal, but yet a gallant gentleman to whom no woman appeals in vain. Cicely tells him of Walter's peril and begs him to obtain the papers and save her lover. He promises; Walter soon arrives, but Dick finds his friendly advances coldly received. He follows Walter as he rides away, and, overtaking him, demands the message. Walter refuses to deliver it and having no alternative, Galloping Dick disarms him, takes the paper, dumps him in a pool, and rides on. Hardly has he gone, when Sir Charles' troopers come down the road, and seeing a horseman ahead, chase after Dick and soon overpower him. They bring him before Sir Charles, who orders him confined. Just then Cicely enters and recognizes her gallant acquaintance of the inn. Cicely suggests that he be locked in the pantry, as it will save standing guard all night. This is done and while the troopers are making merry she manages to steal the key from the cook. When all is dark, she silently unlocks the door and releases Dick. Guiding him to the garden gate they are suddenly confronted by Walter, who at once makes for Dick. But when Cicely explains Dick's gallantry he hangs his head in shame and asks forgiveness. Readily granting this, Dick gaily mounts and goes his way, leaving two happy lovers.

LAUNCHING OF THE BATTLESHIP RIVADAVIA, QUINCY, MASS., AUG. 26, 1911 (Oct. 18).—The Rivadavia was constructed at Quincy, Mass., for the Argentine Republic. She is 585 feet long, weighed 11,000 tons at the time of launching, and when fully completed, with her armament, will will have a total displacement of 30,000 tons. We are first introduced to her as she lies in the ways, with a close view of the stern, showing her enormous rudder and triple screws. Next we see the workmen driving wedges, preparatory to removing all supporting stays, except the cradle, which goes into the water with the ship. The ship was christened by Mme. de Naon, sponsor, acting for the wife of the president of the Argentine Republic. Immediately upon her smashing the bottle of champagne, the great mass begins to move. As she finally strikes the water, we see restraining ropes, fastened to enormous chains, which are attached to the shore, break, one by one, thus gradually retarding her speed and preventing her from going out into the stream too rapidly. As she gets out into the stream, she is immediately picked up by tugs and we leave her there, after a glance at the activity on the river.

He can control the machine perfectly now with one hand--gets a clearer, whiter, steadier light and can adjust it to any of the three intensities without even the faintest flicker.

When we sold this machine we guaranteed it would absolutely

Cut 2-3 from the Monthly Lighting Bill

That sounded almost too good to be true, but they put one in on our 30 day free trial plan.

Did the machine "make good?" Well, the first month it reduced the bill from $22.70 to $9.24 and they operated more hours and got better light than ever before.

We can do just as well for you regardless of what voltage you are using and if you will send for our little free booklet, we'll explain how we do it.

Remember you are paying the Lighting Company 66 2-3 per cent more than you need to every day you wait.

POWERS.

YARN OF A BABY'S SHIRT (Oct. 17).—A heavyweight colored lady is sitting outside the kitchen door knitting a shirt for her piccaninny, who sits contentedly by in his high-chair counting his toes. Presently another colored woman calls the mammy inside and she goes inside after putting the unfinished shirt on the piccaninny and the ball of yarn on her chair. The baby's half grown brother is flying a kite, but has not enough string and is looking for some when he spies the ball of yarn, which he steals and goes away to tie it to the kite. The kite is soon in the air, but the other end of the yarn is attached to the baby's shirt. As the kite rises the shirt begins to unravel and the poor piccaninny is losing his shirt! Finally the kite gets away and carries the youngster with it. There is great commotion in the village and a crowd is soon in pursuit of the infant aviator. At length the string breaks and the baby is caught in the arms of a farmer. The heavyweight colored lady arrives on the scene and there metes out deserved punishment to her first-born.

FIRST MAIL BY AEROPLANE (Oct. 17).—A topical picture showing the first letter and the first mail pouch ever carried in an airship as a regular government carrier. A U. S. postoffice was officially opened at each end of the course at Garden City, L. I., N. Y. Souvenir postcards were sent to their home addresses by the spectators. These were collected and canceled in the regular way, after which they were taken to the aeroplane by a U. S. letter carrier. The aviator, Captain Beck, U. S. A., strapped the pouch to the machine and started on his way. The cards were delivered and the owners will no doubt prize them as souvenirs. The flights are well taken and clearly shown.

HEADLINE ACROBATS (Oct. 17).—A comedy acrobatic act by a well-known knockabout team now playing over the large vaudeville circuits. Their amazing feats are a pleasing contrast to the regular run of pictures and furnishes a vaudeville act far above the usual class of picture house vaudeville. A $2.50 act for ten cents.

THE AWAKENING OF JOHN CLARK (Oct. 21).—John Clark is a ranch hand and Blue Feather an Indian maid. They have learned to love each other and decide to marry. Following the Indian custom, Clark goes to the camp to make a bargain for the hand of the girl. He offers a bag of gold to the chief, her father, who is satisfied with the amount, and the pair are allowed to wed. They go to live in a log cabin and get along nicely until one day two Eastern women, a mother and her daughter, visit the ranch. Clark becomes interested and beats the other cowboys to the task of escorting the ladies about the ranch. The younger woman encourages the advances of Clark and before long there is a love affair on foot. Clark becomes infatuated and regrets his marriage to the Indian girl. Finally he comes home and tells her he is tired of her and advises her to go back to her people.

Blue Feather, heartbroken, does as she is told, whereat the Indians want to revenge the insult, but the girl induces them to desist. Shortly afterward Clark is taken sick with typhoid fever and needs nursing badly. The two Eastern ladies come to the cabin, but when they learn that Clark is suffering from a contagious disease they do not care to enter. Blue Feather at the camp hears of Clark's illness and considers it her duty to go to him. She nurses him back to health and strength. While Clark is recovering the Eastern women visit him, but he realizes now that they are not true friends and bids them go. Blue Feather has proved her worth and brought about the awakening of John Clark.

AMBROSIO.

THE LITTLE CHIMNEY SWEEPER (Oct. 11).—The heartless stepmother apprentices little Gianni to a chimney-sweep, by whom he is cruelly treated. Other children shrink from his grimy garments and sad face, but Nina, the child of rich parents, gives him pennies, toys and clothes. Nina becomes very ill and in her delirium cries for Gianni, who comes to the bedside of the dying girl. Every day he brings flowers to the little grave and is seen by Nina's mother, who, deeply touched by his devotion to her departed darling, takes him into her home and gives him a mother's love.

RELIANCE.

THE ANONYMOUS LETTER (Oct. 7).—Her education completed, Marie leaves the convent school and returns home. She is courted by two men, one, George Barnes, an elderly, wealthy man, and the other Paul Carter. Carter's sinister appearance fills her with revulsion and dread, which she is unable to control, and which angers Carter. After she is married to Barnes he writes to his son in college, who is displeased that his departed mother's place has been taken by another. Shortly thereafter he is taken sick and brought home, and the young stepmother decides to impersonate a nurse and try to win his affection. She succeeds too well, for the youth falls in love with her. He is then told the truth, and the family would have been happy but for Carter, who writes an anonymous letter to Barnes, telling him his wife and son are deceiving him and to be on his guard. Mrs. Carter and her stepson go for an automobile ride and about 35 miles from home the machine breaks down. They meet friends residing in the vicinity and are persuaded to remain over night, notwithstanding ineffectual attempts to reach the Barnes' home by 'phone. The letter preys on Barnes' mind, and when his wife and son fail to return he imagines they have eloped and works himself up into a terrible state. The next morning the party returns and explanations are made, but the shock has so affected Barnes' heart that he dies. The last scenes show the young widow leaving the home and entering a convent, safe from the cruel world.

A NARROW ESCAPE (Oct. 14).—Jim Smith has been without work for some time, and his efforts to secure a job proved fruitless. He meets Red Leary and Black Pete; two thugs, in a saloon, and the look of desperation on his face prompts them to invite him to join in a burglary. He indignantly refuses, and on the way home finds a lost hand-bag containing jewelry and money, which he takes home. His wife persuades him to return the property, the owner's cards giving the address. The butler receives him at the door and takes his name, but gives no reward. Smith is furious and bitterly upbraids himself for a fool, and in this state of mind goes back to the saloon and informs the thugs that he will become a thief. As the three start out Mrs. Smith follows, entreating her husband to come home with her, and finally he gives in to her. She tries to cheer him up, telling him how thankful they should be that they have their beautiful child, but he is still despondent. The next day he reads in the paper an account of the capture of Red Leary and the fatal wounding of Black Pete in the act of committing a robbery, and realizes what a narrow escape he had. He is further convinced that the path of honesty is the right one when he receives a letter from the owner of the purse, enclosing a substantial reward and offering him employment.

BISON.

THE PIONEER'S MISTAKE (Oct. 10).—Mistaking the feathered headdress of a crouching Indian for a bird, the pioneer wounds the red man. Angered, he rouses his tribe to go on the warpath and they attack the village. A stirring battle takes place. The whites are in desperate straits when a party of trappers gallops to the rescue and drives the savages away.

THE INDIAN RUSTLERS (Oct. 13).—The unsuccessful hunting party returns to the village, and being in need of meat the Indians descend upon the grazing herd and rustle off a bunch of cattle. They are seen by a cowboy and his sweetheart, and try to kill him so he will be unable to expose them. A thrilling fight takes place, the Indians being reinforced by the rest of the tribe, and the cowboys, hearing the shots, gallop madly to the rescue of their pal. The Indians are routed and the cowboy and his sweetheart saved from death.

LUX.

A DOG IN A COINER'S DEN (Oct. 13).—Louis, the newsboy, has a pet dog and they are much attached to one another. Whilst strolling through the town, they pick up a pocketbook, and discover that it belongs to a well-known gentleman in the neighborhood, who is possessed of a high sounding French title of the "Castle in Spain" variety. Louis returns the pocketbook to its owner, who presents him with the fabulous sum of 50 cents. Possessed of so much wealth, Louis orders a drink, but, much to his surprise, the waiter bends and twists his fifty cents into various shapes and forms, and finally refuses to serve him. Louis is naturally downhearted over the wreck of his hopes and his newly acquired fortune. However, "luck will turn," says Louis to his dog Tray, and on they go again, thinking no more of the incident. Some days later Louis reads in the paper that the police are considerably perplexed by the circulation of counterfeit coins, the source of which they are unable to trace. This awakens dormant thoughts, and Louis sets off to the mansion of the gentleman with the worthless title, determined to investigate. Some time after Louis has broken himself in the grounds of the mansion, the noble man emerges from the house and drives off. Louis follows in his wake and traces him to a disused house upon a bleak moor. Undaunted, Louis enters the house, and there falls into the hands of the coiner, for such the nobleman proves to be, and his gang. On the principle that "dead men tell no tales," the coiners bind Louis to a table, and placing a keg of gunpowder by his side, light the fuse and depart. Fortunately they do not see Louis's old friend Dog Tray, who is getting anxious, and endeavoring to get into the house also. Nearer and nearer creeps that tiny spark as Louis lies powerless, awaiting his end. But nearer and nearer creeps old Dog Tray in his search for his friend, until at last he reaches his side. Louis loses no time in directing him to remove the burning fuse. Old Tray does not understand at first, but he manages to bite the ropes that bind his master, and together they rush forth into the open air, just as the powder explodes, and destroys all traces of the coiner's work. The witness, however, still lives and is soon at the police station, where he gives the necessary information and receives a big reward for his services.

BILL, POLICE CYCLIST (Oct. 13).—A comedy, showing Bill filling the position of a police cyclist. In his capacity of police cyclist he is a prominent figure in a wild and thrilling chase after a hooligan. The details of the chase are too "Billesque" to be described, but they culminate in a finale which is, in every way, worthy of the talented little comedian.

CHAMPION.

A GIRL AND A SPY (Oct. 16).—The old general, the girl's father, is in the foreground where he had just been carried, wounded, by his men. In the background a battle is raging with powder and ball, while the hand-to-hand conflict between those two bitter rivals is taking place, with the girl and the general looking on.

The hero is a spy, forced to be such by his superior officer. In Confederate garb, he meets and falls in love with a fair daughter of the South. In a certain battle or skirmish, he refuses to fire on his own people, and she, not knowing that he is a Federal, thinks him a coward and thus despises him.

From the moment he fell in love with the maiden, he had decided not to perform his despicable task, but to get back to his own side as soon as possible—that is,—to do only the duties which fall to a soldier's lot. His rival for the girl's hand has tried in various ways to be revenged for being ousted from his position as cavalier to the young lady, but without success.

CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE (Oct. 18).—Two young men, friendly rivals for the hand of a sweet-faced Western girl, start forth to make, each, his respective fortune. In five years, one becomes a bank cashier, the other a ranch foreman. We see the cashier mingling in the swell clubs of the upper ten, living beyond his means to keep up to the style of his associates. Again, we see him "caught short" in his accounts.

The foreman and the ranch owner start cityward to make a deposit of gold nuggets in the bank. The ranch owner meets the cashier and invites him to his swell club. The cashier fleeces the ranchman at cards out of a pile of greenbacks. The next night, the ranchman is ready for another fleecing, but is pursuaded not to go by his foreman. He gives the latter his roll and sends him home. He attends the club but has nothing to lose. The cashier is disappointed, but shows by his manner he would run a big risk to get the ranch owner's wad.

In the meantime the foreman had started for home. If the money in his possession were only is an integral part of special metal—fitted with a sliding contact, clamped by a set screw or wing nut, if desired. The design of the contact fits the carbon, furnishing a larger area of contact, and thus requires less pressure to securely hold the carbon. It is impossible to score the carbon, and the adjustment screw will not "freeze" under any considerations. The concentric adjustment permits instantaneous renewals of carbons.

his, it would mean the possibility of his getting the woman he loves. The night is rainy, so he dons his rain coat and cap.

At the club the cashier decides to leave after the ranch owner's departure and he, too, dons a rain coat and cap; later these men pass the same lonely spot. We see them, but can't tell which is the other. Shortly after the ranch owner falls a victim to the bullet of one of them, and the spectator is in ignorance as to who really committed the deed. But the foreman is arrested as the perpetrator of the crime. Then comes the court procedure, which is carried out in all it's interesting formula to the minutest detail.

The cashier is one of the jurymen and out of the twelve men all except him stand out for conviction. He finally confesses his crime. The foreman's name is freed from stigma, and this he shares with his sweet-faced Western girl.

NESTOR.

LET US SMOOTH THE WAY (Oct. 11).—David and Martha Waldon had reached the evening of life; yet despite the fact that David had worked steadily as head draughtsman for over thirty years, they were still practically penniless. This was partly due to the couple's philanthropy and to Martha's ill health.

Had not the Columbia Construction Company changed hands, all might have gone well, for they generally overlooked any error that his failing sight had caused. Not so the new manager, however, and as a consequence, David was soon in search of new employment.

Scene from "Let Us Smooth the Way" (Nestor).

From place to place he went, receiving always the same reply, "too old." David's none too robust health unfitted him for steady manual labor, and his eyes for the work he could do. So within a year's time, not only the little they had saved, but every piece of furniture that could be spared had gone, while Martha, without proper medical aid or nourishment, lay hovering between life and death.

Almost desperate, David snatched up their only clock and hurried toward the pawnshop, but ere he could reach the door, two romping children ran against him—he fell, and the old timepiece lay shattered at his feet.

Officer Dolan was so moved by the old man's despair that he straightway decided Martha must have the best of care—Alas! it was too late—her tired, patient spirit had passed to the Great Unknown, while David, whose benevolence had brought him to poverty, was hustled, with business-like promptness, off to the poor-farm.

MUTT AND JEFF AND THE BLACK HAND (Oct. 14).—Only two years in the Land of the Almighty Dollar, and Mariangelo Pinozzi and his good wife, Francesca, are the happy owners of a busy fruit stand, which unfortunately comes under the notice of the Black Hand Society.

Unless Mariangelo contributes the large sum of money thrice asked by the dreaded bomb throwers, he and Francesca will journey forth to that undiscovered country whence no traveler ever returns. As time is nearly up, poor Pinozzi grows frantic with fear.

Mutt and Jeff approach. They have a whole dime to spend; they also have a well-developed case of "appetitis." The bananas look very inviting; moreover, they are very filling. With a "lead us to them" rush, the hungry twain swoop upon the gesticulating Sicilian. As the bananas do the disappearing act, Mariangelo gets an inspiration.

Will Mutt and Jeff take charge of the fruit stand for one week, or two, or longer—eat all the fruit they want and take all the receipts? Will they, huh? So, while Mr. and Mrs. Pinozzi scamper to safety, Mutt and Jeff take possession of the business.

The Black Hand cannot be trifled with; Mariangelo has not "come across" and the kidnappers get to work. Mutt and Jeff are soon captured and taken before the Presiding Bunch of Crooks, who fail to find any resemblance between Mutt and Jeff and the Pinozzi couple. Peeved over this measly trick, they force "the long and the short of it" to join the "ranks." This is done, with the aid of numerous stilettoes acting as accelerators.

The police have been over-active of late; why not blow up Headquarters? Lots are drawn and the fatal slip of paper goes to Mutt. Luckily for him the Chief of Police has heard of this Black Hand meeting and sends out a number of his best men to corral the entire outfit.

After a nice mix-up, Mutt, Jeff and the Black Handers are taken to Headquarters. Jeff is recognized as an old time friend of the Chief, who treats him to a good cigar, while poor Mutt goes to a dark dungeon because the tell-tale slip of paper is found on him. Alas! poor Mutt!

ROMANCE AND UPPERCUTS (Oct. 14).—Alfred Kelcey and Clara Brooks had been betrothed since childhood, and now the long nourished hopes of the old time friends and neighbors, the Kelceys and the Brookses, were about to materialize.

Jack, a dashing, flirtatious, caddish cousin of Alfred's, tires of the swift city life and goes to his country relations for an indefinite stay. Here is where the course of true love begins to zig-zag.

Jack's city ways, his dashing demeanor and his elaborate sartorial equipment are more than the sweet guileless country maid can stand. Soon she finds herself thinking more of Jack and less of Alfred, and when the latter is unexpectedly called away, Jack loses no time to win her. Things progress rapidly until Clara half-heartedly consents to elope before Alfred's return.

Her little sister, Dorothy, is a good observer, soon concludes that something is wrong and that Alfred's presence is urgently needed. She forthwith writes to him. He promptly answers the call and, after some romantic and "uppercuttic" incidents, the proposed elopement is quashed; Jack gets "his" in the proximity of a romantic rivulet, and Clara is gently escorted back home.

Later, forgiveness is asked for and gladly granted. With Jack summarily removed out of love's pathway, Alfred and his bride Clara face a future full of happiness.

THE COWBOY AND THE OUTLAW (Oct. 12).—The Spring round-up is in progress, and the boys have been absent from the ranch for five weeks. Jack Dunton asks for a day off in order to visit his sweetheart at the ranch. He wishes to spend as much time as possible with her, so he takes a short cut over the mountains.

The trail is seldom used, and he is in doubt as to the right direction, so he proceeds slowly. He is held up by a gang of outlaws and robbed of his horse. The outlaws have recently been active and the sheriff organizes a posse to trail and capture them, if possible.

Jack meets the posse on the trail as he is slowly making his way to the ranch, and informs the sheriff where he encountered the outlaws, and that they have stolen his horse. Following the direction he has given them, the sheriff and his posse surprise the outlaws, but the leader escapes on Jack's horse. He is hotly pursued, but manages to elude them, and leaving the horse on the trail, makes good his escape up the side of the mountain.

Traveling along the unfamiliar trail, Jack loses his footing and falls down a steep wall of rock and is severely injured. He is found by the outlaw, who nurses him back to health at the risk of his own life, for capture would mean death. When Jack is able to travel, the outlaw escorts him to the ranch and there meets Jack's sweetheart. They are both visibly impressed with one another. Jack is very weak, as they assist him to a couch in the ranch house.

When he is alone with Jack's sweetheart, the outlaw makes love to her, which the hero-worshiping, romantic girl reciprocates; Jack comes upon them in fond embrace and a passion of anger surges through him. He pushes them apart, and then a revulsion of feeling comes to him. After all, he owes his life to this desperado. Taking the girl's hand, he places it in that of the outlaw and turns his back on his own happiness. At the gate he meets the sheriff and realizes he is after the outlaw.

Jack professes ignorance of the outlaw's whereabouts, but the sheriff's information is accurate, and he is suspicious. He goes down the trail to call his posse and search the premises. Jack hurries back to the outlaw, and sending the girl to delay the sheriff as long as possible, he exchanges hat and coat with the desperado, who gets a horse and rides away to safety and freedom.

Jack races to the barn, firing his gun as he runs, to attract the attention of the posse. Thinking they have the outlaw cornered, they surround the barn and fire through the door and windows until all is still inside. Cautiously entering the barn, they find Jack with a bullet wound in his shoulder. The penitent sweetheart begs his forgiveness and Jack comes into his own. He has paid his debt of gratitude to the outlaw.

YANKEE.

THE LOST KERCHIEF (Oct. 16).—Ned's persistency in attempting to return a lost handkerchief to a charming young lady in spite of attempts to ignore him, gets him into all sorts of trouble. He follows her from place to place and she continues to evade him, until she becomes tired of his persistency and has him driven away from a ferry boat, bodily thrown from a car, refused admission to the different amusement places at a summer resort, and finally has him arrested for annoying her.

He tries to explain to the Judge and Mabel that he had merely tried to return her handkerchief. When asked to show the handkerchief he cannot find it, having placed it in the sweat band of his hat during the excitement, and forgotten all about it.

After being fined $50.00, he is freed and goes home a wiser man.

Upon reaching home he finds his sister in conversation with the very young woman who had caused him all the trouble. Satisfactory explanations follow, and the result is a happy ending to a day of mishaps.

THE MAN WHO CAME BACK (Oct. 20).—A big, strong, young American, the son of wealthy parents, instead of devoting his time to business and becoming a respected citizen, finds that a life of idleness and sport is more to his liking. Warnings and threats make no impression until the father, losing all patience, finally disowns him and drives him from the house.

He soon discovers that the dollar is his best friend, as persistent efforts to borrow money from his fellow members at an exclusive club results in a polite request for his resignation.

He falls lower and lower until finally he becomes a tramp. He becomes keenly aware of his condition when time and again he is driven from doorsteps or chased by dogs whose irate owners have no sympathy for tramps. Shunned by men, women and children in every walk of life, he becomes immune to all sense of feeling and sinks to the lowest levels.

A little girl's kindness in offering part of her food opens his eyes and when the little girl's sister reproves him for the life he is leading and tells him to become a man, new courage enters into his shrunken and stupefied existence and he promises to make another effort.

He comes to his father and pleads for another chance to make good. The yearnings of the boy's voice and his poor condition touches the father's heart and a reconciliation follows. With the picture of the young girl always before him the young man makes great strides in his business career, and when he presents himself at the home of the young girl whose kind words gave him courage to start life anew, she does not recognize his identity. She admires his manly spirit in confessing that he is the former tramp and as their acquaintance length-

KIMBLE A. C. MOTOR

To Run Your Picture Machine

The Presidential Election Pot will soon begin to boil. Streets will be crowded with people who usually stay at home evenings. Every seat in your theater will be taken. You'll have to crowd one performance after another to please the excitement-loving multitude.

A Kimble A. C. Motor will be Almost a Physical Necessity

And it will not only relieve your operator of nearly all the labor of his calling, but will permit him to do "stunts" that cannot be done by hand, however skilled that hand may be.

It is a Variable Speed Motor. One lever gives you every possible shading of speed between 300 r.p.m. and 3,000 r.p.m., and leaves the operator's hands free, and mind and eye alert to make the most of every situation.

And it costs so little!

⅛ H.P. Kimble motor with grooved pulley:
110 volts alternating current....$27.00
220 volts alternating current.... 28.50
Countershaft 10.00

Installation is simple and easy.

Either belt direct from pulley on motor to pulley on fly wheel shaft of machine, or replace crank on machine with 6-inch pulley; belt from that to 2-inch pulley on countershaft and from 15-inch pulley or countershaft to motor pulley. For the latter installation we supply countershaft where desired.

Kimble Fans for Ventilation

Controlled ventilation is more important in winter than in summer, and its importance increases with the size of your audiences. If you are on an alternating circuit, give us size and height of your room and size and make of your picture machine, and we will tell you what fan motor and what machine motor you should have and just what we will guarantee them to do. UNCLE PETE'S RUSE (Oct. 16).—Captain Warren, of the Confederate Service, evades the pickets of the Union lines and almost takes his life in his hands to visit his young wife. He is greeted affectionately by her and the servants and is enjoying his stay when the house is surrounded by a number of Union soldiers, who have an intimation that he is in the house. He is thoroughly frightened and his wife is terrified.

Uncle Pete, an aged servitor, possessed of an abnormal amount of acumen, takes matters in his own hands, being the only cool and collected person on the premises. He takes in the situation and matches his wits against the vigilance of the soldiers.

Captain Warren is hustled upstairs by Uncle Pete and hastily placed in bed. The old negro procures paint and in a jiffy his master is made to resemble a man in the throes of an attack of smallpox. This done, the servant ushers in the soldiers with mock gravity, after coaching Captain Warren. They rush to his bedside to be informed that he is near death's door with the malignant disease. They retreat rather precipitously to stand guard over the premises. This is a precaution which the negro has not reckoned on, but he is equal to the emergency and later announces that the captain is dead and solicits their aid at the funeral obsequies. Owing to the fact that no other help is near, they consent.

Captain Warren, bearing all the appearance of a corpse, is placed in a hastily prepared casket. The lid is fastened down and the soldiers go to dig the grave. Uncle Pete becomes active and his master is taken out and some weights substituted. Solemnly the soldiers bear the supposed remains to the grave and the wife is disconsolate, believing that her husband is really dead, the scheme being so genuinely realistic. The soldiers depart and she is overjoyed to find her husband alive and well. The Union soldiers have an inkling that they have been tricked and return and unearth the box to find its contents. In the meantime, Captain Warren has made good his escape and the colored man enjoys himself at the expense of the soldiers, who were so cleverly tricked.

THE AGGRESSOR (Oct. 19).—Hank Denby, a miner, has a loving little wife, but he is a brute and abuses her. She bears it patiently until one day when forbearance ceases to be a virtue. He goes out to his work after an unusually violent scene, in which his wife is in tears as a consequence. She is all alone on the mountain, but resolves to desert her husband—to go—anywhere to rid herself of the obnoxious presence of the husband.

She packs a few of her belongings, writes a note to Denby, and is about to go out into the world, when Philip Baldwin, a prospector much older than she, comes into the cabin in search of food and drink. He is welcomed by the woman as he is kind. He looks about the cabin and notes her preparation for flight in surprise. On being questioned, the girl-wife tells him of the ill treatment she has been subjected to and her decision to leave it all. He mildly tries to dissuade her, to no avail. She is determined to leave and asks to be allowed to travel in his company. The big, rough fellow sees no impropriety in that and the woman is guiltless of any wrong-doing. They leave the cabin, arrive at the tent of Baldwin and in attempting to secure water for her, he falls over a cliff. She runs around the eminence and finds him.

In the meantime, the husband has returned home, read the note, takes the trail and follows the pair with the insane idea that some man has stolen the affections of his wife. He comes upon them just as his wife is trying to extricate Baldwin from his perilous position. He is about to kill him when the wife interferes. Denby takes Baldwin on his back and carries him, unconscious to his cabin, where he nurses him back to health. On being convalescent, Baldwin leaves, but is followed by Denby to a rocky peak. Slapping Baldwin's face, he challenges him to a revolver duel. Baldwin is loath to fight, but is provoked, and back to back they start to walk apart. At the signal they turn and fire. Denby falls dead. His wife comes out and falls prostrate across his body. Baldwin gazes at the woman for a time and then, not understanding, walks away down the slope leaving Mrs. Denby alone with her dead husband whom she had not loved in life.

THANHOUSER.

THE EARLY LIFE OF DAVID COPPERFIELD (Oct. 17).—The film starts with the time Aunt Betsy, an eccentric spinster, flattens her nose against the windowpane before she enters the Copperfield home, over which the stork is hovering. Aunt Betsy, in anticipation of a birth, had set her mind on a girl—because she abhors boys. When it is therefore announced that the stork has brought a boy, she vanishes from the house 'like a discontented fairy."

David's mother is a helpless young woman, impractical and unassertive. She married an elderly gentleman, who dies before David is born. Eight years after David's birth, she is flattered by the attentions of Edward Murdstone, who is ardent in his courtship because the widow's money is such a tantalizing incentive.

David shows his dislike for Mr. Murdstone. His mother marries, however, while he is absent on a trip with Peggotty to her brother's house at Yarmouth. Here he meets hearty fish folk—among whom he finds little Em'ly.

With the marriage of his mother to Murdstone begins a series of hardships which finally end when his mother dies. After his mother's death, Mr. Murdstone places him in a bottling factory, but David runs away and finds refuge with his Aunt Betsy.

THE SATYR AND THE LADY (Oct. 20).—A young artist, working on a painting he called "The Satyr and the Lady," was pleased with his woman model, but found that the lay figure Satyr did not meet with requirements. So he took a trip through New York's crowded East Side, where he knew he could find a model suited to the character of his work.

After a short trip through the congested market places of the Ghetto, the artist saw, in the person of a shoe-string vendor, the very model he wanted. The Peddler was glad to pose, because, when told how much he would get, found that "sitting still" was a much more remunerative occupation than hustling around with shoe-laces.

As he sat, day after day, at the feet of the beautiful woman, the peddler was impressed with her loveliness, and to him she became the embodiment of all that is good and noble. As a matter of fact, the model is of the ordinary kind, pleasure-loving, good natured, charitable and without any particularly high standards.

She is very kind to the "Satyr," although he is repulsive and ugly. When the picture is completed, she gives him a rose, which he highly treasures and dreams over.

Some time after, the Satyr is on his deathbed. Realizing that his only child, a little girl, will be left without anyone to care for her, he pens a note to the "beautiful lady," telling her of his condition, and asking her to take care of his daughter.

He sends his little girl with the note to the artist, with a request that he forward it to the model—for the Satyr does not know where "the lady" lives. The artist comes with the note when the apartments of the model ring with the hilarity and abandon of her friends. She reads the pitiful message and is moved. She leaves the guests, among whom the artist has remained, and goes to the shabby East Side tenement; but arrives too late. The Satyr is dead and his child is left alone in the world.

The model takes the child to her home. She finds her friends still dancing and enjoying themselves, so she puts them out with little ceremony; for all her thoughts are now for the child. After her guests have departed, she tucks the little one in bed, and vows, for the child's sake, to lead a new and better life.

The artist, who has long admired the model, hides behind a curtain, and the new beautiful, womanly qualities she shows while caring for the child, completely win his heart. They are married, give up their so-called Bohemian life, and become useful, active members of society.

SOLAX.

HE WAS A MILLIONAIRE (Oct. 11).—Mr. Amzi Wilson, a man of moderate circumstances, had become a harmless lunatic, and he thought he was a milionaire. He overheard his servants, Susan and Jenkins, making fun of him, and deciding to discharge them, he gave each a check for a large amount and told them to get out.

Wilson then takes a moonlight stroll, and thinking he has too much money for one man, he takes his checkbook along to see what he can do in the way of helping humanity. He goes to the pond in the park and fishes with bank checks for bait. He sees Pete, a gentleman of destiny, reclining on one of the park benches, and thinks him a good subject for his charity, so he gives Pete a check for a million dollars, telling him to be a good boy. Pete collapses, but soon recovers, and thinking the check looks good he decides to use it. He visits a restaurant and orders a whole turkey; is about to eat when the proprietor decides it would be best to collect in advance. Pete hands him the check for a million, and, of course, gets thrown out. Next he tries a saloon, but fares the same fate.

In the meantime the lunatic is still distributing his imaginary wealth. His absence from home is discovered and a reward of one hundred dollars is offered for his return. The police get on the trail and soon have Pete in custody, thinking he is the lunatic. He escapes, however in time to capture the real lunatic and get the reward.

HIS MOTHER'S HYMN (Oct. 13).—Paul Wellard is leaving home for the city. He goes to say good-bye to his mother and finds her at the organ singing her favorite hymn. For a while he prospers very well in the city, but finally gets in bad company, gambles, steals and loses his position.

Unable to secure another position he becomes desperate and seeing the opportunity, he enters a house and is filling his pockets with valuable jewelry when he hears some one coming. He hides behind some drapery and sees a sweet-faced old lady seat herself at the organ and play his mother's favorite hymn, "Lead Kindly Light." His heart is touched, and he gives up the stolen articles, and tells the old lady of his downfall and of his mother. She forgives him, tells him to start new again, and shows him a photo of her own wandering boy. The old lady gives Paul money and helps him secure a position. A year later a burglar enters Paul's home. Paul hearing the noise, gets his revolver and catches the burglar in the act of taking money from his desk. The burglar attempts to knock the revolver from Paul's hand and a struggle takes place, during which a much worn photo falls from the burglar's pocket. Paul's wife, hearing the noise, rushes into the room, gets the revolver and points it at the thief, while Paul picks up the photo and at once recognizes the face of his friend and benefactress. He tells the thief to take a chair and sits down by his side while he tells him of his dear old mother and how she is waiting for his return. The thief breaks down and promises to give up his wickedness. The next day there is a happy reunion of mother and son.

CHASING THE RAINBOW Oct. 12).—A shabby room, a hovel, a morgue of hope, a mausoleum of joy, in which dwell only care and woe—and an invalid and her little daughter. There is no more medicine; no money to buy more. But the brave spirit of the child knows no daunt, and she determines to beg the druggist for more medicine. She braves the storm outside, wends her way to the drug store. But druggists are prosaic; there is little poetry or philanthropy in pharmacy; the child's pitiful pleadings are in vain. Disheartened, she leaves the store and walks outside. Suddenly she sees in the sky a wonderful thing, a marvelous blending of radiant colors. She asks a passer by what it is, and he tells her it is a rainbow, and that at the end of it is a large pot of gold. A pot of gold! Gold, with which to buy medicine, lots of it, enough to cure her sick mother all at once. And the child sets out to find the gold that the golden colors lead to.

She comes to a place of many brilliant lights—here must be the entrance to the fairyland where she will find the gold. She mounts a flight of stairs, and timidly enters—Paradise! For an angel voice is singing, and heavenly music is playing, and other angels in wonderful gowns are sitting at tables, and bright stars are gleaming—or are they diamonds?—and a wonderful, celestial glare is over all. But a rough hand reaches suddenly out to seize her, and a gruff voice, a voice very unlike an angel's, tells her to leave the enchanted land; but a strong man's voice gives a command, and a beautiful angel's soft arms entwine about her little form, and a sweet voice questions and surprised ears listen to the child's strange, sad story. The actress on the roof garden learns the situation and—yes, actresses have hearts, big, throbbing, tender hearts. A collection is made—the child gets her pot of gold. It means life for the sick mother, happiness for both—and happiness for those who gave as well.

Souvenir pillow to be given with each ticket at Sales Co. Ball, Alhambra Hall, 126th St. and Lenox Ave., N. Y. City, Sat. Eve., Oct. 14.

ANNOUNCEMENT No. 10

NO TWO PERSONS CAN SEE THE SAME THING IN THE SAME MANNER. BUT, it is our purpose to have you understand the EXCLUSIVE IDEA as we see it in a serial talk.

MANY years of experience and analysis on our part has made apparent the needs of our MOVEMENT—YOU CANNOT BE CONTENT TO DRIVE ALONG WITHOUT A DEFINITE OR FIXED SYSTEM OF OPERATION; YET the past is but a record of blind struggle forward, borne along by the popular DEMAND—THE EXCLUSIVE IDEA means SYSTEM. IT means the establishment of conditions which make it possible for brains and energy to demonstrate that a business can be benefited by the PROPER EXERCISE of BRAINS and ENERGY.

We know you have stood powerless in the past to do more than accept the PROGRAMME and display it on HACKNEYED lines with the offering of a PRAYER that your COMPETITOR did not have the same bill on the MORROW—for you could not know nor could he. SO that EXCLUSIVE SERVICE means also breaking away from that NIGHTMARE OF THE SAME BILL; and if we can clear you of that horror and do nothing more you are certain of success in a measure PROPORTIONATE to the brains and energy you inject into your BUSINESS. Is there any EXHIBITOR in the field to-day other than the NATIONAL EXHIBITOR, who after a day of planning can close his eyes at night confident that he is a factor in his business and not a tool of trade CONDITIONS?

WE answer emphatically NO. The NATIONAL EXCLUSIVE PROGRAMME means the emancipation of the EXHIBITOR and EXCHANGE from a competitive condition which destroys and cannot assist COMPETITION however between two or more programmes is a healthy condition, for that condition calls for the use and EXERCISE of the best in all FACTIONS. It means QUALITY if you would succeed and on QUALITY the NATIONAL PROGRAMME challenges the world.

JOSE PRESENTED WITH THE ILL-FATED HANDKERCHIEF

The Cross of Pearls

Outrivaled in love, and penniless, Gabriel conceives to steal the beautiful, time honored Cross of Pearls. Interrupted in the attempt, he commits a crime and leaves for evidence the handkerchief of his successful rival, Jose. Gabriel confesses to Padre Antone, and, being denied absolution unless he surrender to civil authorities, smiles wickedly, defiantly, knowing full well the Padre cannot reveal confessional secrets though it be to save his own brother's, Jose's, life. But the power and horror of conscience was a force Gabriel had not reckoned with. How it worked to save an innocent man's life is an extremely wonderful story.

Little Em'ly and David Copperfield

Second of the Series from the Novel By CHARLES DICKENS

Released Tuesday, October 24th

For dramatic situations and tense climaxes no better part of Dicken's novel could have been chosen for motion picture presentation.

The story of simple Little Em'ly and the persons who live around her is resonant with dramatic force and surcharged with tragedy. Laughter sometimes penetrates through the tears, which only intensifies the pathos.

Em'ly, Steerforth, his valet, Uncle Dan, Martha, and Ham are the chief actors in this chapter of David's life.

The Jewels of ALLAH

Released Friday, October 27th

The mysterious and pugent atmosphere of the Orient, permeates this Arabian tale of the stealing of consecrated jewels.

The central figures are a Sheik, of an Arabian mosque, a French Count, who steals the treasure, and an American girl.

The Sheik follows around the world the calculating Frenchman and locates him at the home of an American millionaire to whose daughter he is about to be married, and whom he invests with "his family jewels." The Count is exposed in time and the girl returns the jewels to the Sheik.

David Copperfield Heralds are Ready—Send your Order before the supply runs out. They are $5.50 per thousand.

The Loves of David Copperfield. Third of the David Copperfield series will be released Tuesday, Oct. 31st.

INDEPENDENT FILMS A CREDIT TO THE INDUSTRY

WE have completed a half dozen quality pictures and are busily engaged every minute turning out more.

¶ Each and every picture we manufacture will be worth while or it will not be placed upon the market.

¶ The photographic quality of each picture produced is equal to any we have seen anywhere.

¶ Careful attention has been given to the selection of scenarios for High Class Comedies, Strong Heart-Interest Dramas, and occasional split reels.

¶ Your favorites Miss Mary Pickford ("Little Mary") and Mr. Owen Moore will appear in our pictures.

¶ We will release two subjects each week commencing the first week in December—perhaps sooner.

¶ We hope for the unanimous support of all Independent exchanges, at the same time assuring incomparable quality.

¶ The management is fully conversant with the requirements of exchanges and exhibitors.

THE UNVEILING

Saving a Young Man from Moral, Social and Maybe Financial Ruin

The boy, who is the idol of his widowed mother, returns from college with a collegiate record she is justly proud of. To mark the occasion his fiancée, sweetheart and her mother come to spend a few days. The too-indulgent mother, however, is blind to the fact that the boy is spending most of his evenings in full dress, which should have told her that Bohemian society was engaging his attention. A show girl, who learns that he will soon come into great wealth, determines to win him. Unsophisticated as he is, he is an easy prey. A friend of the family warns the mother of her boy's danger, which she is loath to believe until positive proof is presented. Pleadings are in vain, for the boy is fascinated, and so the sorrowing mother, feeling she has lost all that she has lived for, determines upon self-destruction and is prevented only by the timely appearance of her visiting friend, who devises the plan that awakens the boy. She has the mother pretend suicide on account of the loss of fortune. This shows the boy the true nature and design of the object of his infatuation.

The Adventures of Billy

Suggested by Press Comment on the Tramp Evil

Recently there has been much comment in the press on the tramp evil, and one writer suggested that moving pictures might be made to clearly show the result of this public nuisance. Little Billy, the bootblack, finding luck against him, decides to move to some other town. To do this he must walk, as he hasn't the wherewith for a railroad ticket. While trudging through the country, he falls into the hands of a couple of sinister looking tramps, and they at once, by threats, force him to beg for them. A day or so later the tramps hold up an old man, and while procuring his money throw him down with such force as to unintentionally kill him. Panic-stricken at their awful deed, they feel that the boy's knowledge of the affair will prove disastrous for them, and so they decide to get rid of him. Through the sagacity of a dog the boy is saved and the tramps are captured.

EDISON KINETOSCOPES

IT is but natural that the man who made all motion pictures possible should to-day be producing the very best machine for projecting them.

Thomas A. Edison, the world's greatest genius and inventor, stands behind the Edison projecting Kinetoscope, and his name and signature are your guarantee of quality and satisfaction.

Any interested exhibitor or prospective exhibitor is invited to write us for particulars.

EDISON FILMS

TUESDAY, OCTOBER 24th.

"A Day at West Point Military Academy, N. Y."

The United States army officer is shown in the making at West Point, the pride of the country. Parades, drills, artillery maneuvers, handling the big guns follow in interesting succession and the film closes with Admiral Togo's review of the corps on his visit to West Point, August 12, 1911.

WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 25th.

ON ONE REEL

"A FAIRIES' BANQUET"

Cast.

The Fairy King.....Edwin Clarke
The Fairy Queen.....Gertrude McCoy
Puck.....Ethel Browning

A short fairy picture which is bound to delight every child who sees it.

"How the Telephone Came to Town"

Cast.

Leader of the Indignation Meeting.....Miriam Hutchins
The Mayor.....Joseph A. Wilkes
Superintendent of the Telephone Company.....Biglowe Cooper
A School Teacher.....Mrs. C. Jay Williams

Here is a comedy of types. The ladies of a small country village determined to resist the invasion of unsightly telephone poles. They didn't quite succeed, but they certainly furnished plenty of amusement.

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 27th.

"AN ISLAND COMEDY"

"AN ISLAND COMEDY."

Cast.

Mr. Schuyler.....Marc McDermott
The one he adores.....Miriam Nesbitt
Her father.....William Wadsworth
Her small brother.....Yale Boss

Light comedy of the most delightful order taken at the Thousand Islands, St. Lawrence River. The story is bright and original and the scenery wonderfully beautiful.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 28th.

"THE KID FROM THE KLONDYKE"

"The Elusive Graft," by Rex Beach.

Cast.

The Kid.....Harold M. Shaw
The stenographer.....Reeva Greenwood
Her father.....John R. Cumpson
A smooth article.....Edward Boulden
His confederates.....Alice Weeks, Gertrude McCoy

This is a distinctly unusual and entertaining comedy. The "Kid," unused to the world and with his big pile, was thought to be an easy mark, but he proved himself smarter than was expected and got the girl he wanted, too.

Facts and Comments

A MINNEAPOLIS newspaper has started a so-called crusade against moving picture houses in that city by reason of the alleged unsafe condition of these places. An entire page of its local space is given up to the results of a personally conducted tour of investigation, while the editorial tocsin is sounded in double leads and double columns. The paper has made the astounding discovery, that there "are films, which are non-ignitable, but they are not generally in use." Another startling fact, revealed to the general public, is told in the editorial announcement, "that a set of readily ignited films can be purchased for five dollars, while the same amount of non-ignitable films would cost $50." Absurd as these bits of editorial wisdom sound to us or to anyone that has given the matter the slightest attention, many people will take such elaborate misinformation for stern facts and feel a panic in their timid souls. That these "crusades" do great harm both to individual exhibitors and the industry generally cannot be disputed, but in part at least exhibitors are themselves to blame.

As a rule they are not organized, have no great personal influence in the community at large and invite, in a measure, these senseless attacks. If they had a strong local organization and would make that fact known to press and public; if they would plan and carry on a campaign of education among the public, enlightening them as to all the most important facts of the moving picture, its production and exhibition, they would not stand so naked before malicious or ignorant attacks. What is going on in Minneapolis today may be repeated in some other American city tomorrow. The lesson of Minneapolis should therefore not go unheeded by exhibitors in other places. Let them get together and supply the needful information to their patrons, either through the press or, if the press be hostile, through little folders that may be handed to their patrons. No better safeguard against wanton, willful misrepresentation and injury to the moving picture can be adapted. If one paper is "crusading," the rival paper is always willing to give a hearing to the other side. In nine cases out of ten, these "crusades" are started with a view of bolstering up a waning circulation or with some other ulterior motive. The public welfare is only a thin pretense.

OUR old friend, the "sectarian film," which has caused so much trouble, worry and loss to exhibitors all over the country, is still with us. It made its last appearance in Coeur D'Alene, Idaho. The Lyric Moving Picture Theater in that city exhibited a film called the "Two Devotions." As a result a Catholic priest of prominence in the city devoted a Sunday sermon to denouncing the picture as "wrong and entirely untrue and incorrect." It appears that a portrayal of the last rite to the dying was attempted in the picture, which moved the man in the pulpit to say "that there is not money enough in this United States to allow a moving picture machine to get inside a room, where the last rite to the dying is performed." In his anger the clergyman gave utterance to this somewhat intemperate declaration: "In some communities the picture machine would have been demolished." The warlike priest further stated, that "two years ago he had been forced to take a similar step and as a result of his action, had forced one picture house out of business."

It is unfortunate, that manufacturers continue to tread on such delicate ground. The exhibitor is well nigh helpless. As a rule he must take what his exchange is pleased to give him and if he does not run his full program, he is apt to come in for hostile criticism by his patrons. Manufacturers, who have the least understanding and sympathy for the exhibitor, bearing the heat and burden of the day, will not embarrass him hereafter with pictures that will offend the religious feelings of any denomination. The picture and theology are and always should be poles apart. If there is a doubt whether a certain picture will or will not fall within the category of "sectarian films," resolve the doubt in favor of the exhibitor and drop the proposed picture. In the case mentioned the priest may have gone too far in his denunciation, but there must have been some provocation.

RUMORS of a threatened increase of prices of admission to the theaters will not down. It is proposed to increase the maximum price for a seat from two dollars to two dollars and a half. Some managers speak of a proportionate increase all around. These facts are interesting to the moving picture circles, because they are very likely to have a bearing on their prices. In too many places the nickel is still the prevailing price of admission. While owners of feature films, playing regular theatrical circuits have no difficulty in getting fifty cents for a seat, the ordinary moving picture house has made no attempt whatever to ask higher prices for better attractions, say features with lectures and special music. Why no such attempt is made, is one of the unsolved mysteries of filmdom, of which we may speak at greater length in the near future.

IN its department for education and science The Moving Picture World tells of a society, composed of men of the highest culture and devoted to the cause of popular education. It appears that the society intends to enlist the moving picture as an aid in spreading education of the best and highest type among the public generally. Count Zeppelin is to deliver the first lecture, the subject being aeronautics. His lecture, like all the rest, will be illustrated by the cinematograph, special pictures relevant to the subject having been taken some time ago. From a medical journal, published in Chicago, we have taken a most interesting report of a lecture delivered by Dr. Theodore H. Weisenburg on Nervous Diseases. The lecture was illustrated by moving pictures, taken under the direction of the Lubin Manufacturing Company, which is entitled to great credit for this unusual but extremely difficult and valuable work. As the fields of usefulness of the moving picture are widening, popular respect for the great invention will increase, a fact, which cannot fail to redound in some measure to the benefit of the exhibitor.

THE French are fortunate in possessing a publication, completely covering the moving picture field in all its branches with scientific thoroughness, yet written in a simple and lucid style. We refer to "Le Cinematographe," a book of over three hundred pages, octavo, published recently by M. Jacques Ducom in Paris, and briefly reviewed in another part of the paper. The history of the moving picture, a matter in which the general public evinces an interest as keen as that of professional moving picture people, is treated with minute attention and contains many interesting features. There is scarcely a page without value to some department of our great industry. THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD will from time to time print extracts from this valuable book hoping thereby to be the means of helping and pleasing its readers. There is no book in any other language, which so completely covers the ground.

A friend of the moving picture, writing from Oregon, tells of an experience in a Portland theater. "Recently" she says, "I dropped into a theater to see "The Three Musketeers." During the battle I thought I was in a cafeteria, being treated to a free lunch. That's the kind of effects we get to represent the dignity of the sword." Her observation tallies with that of many others. If there is to be a revival of effects, let us profit by the mistakes of the past and avoid them. Effects have been abandoned by so many exhibitors, because they had become ridiculous. With all the well-founded prejudice against the sound effects, exhibitors always realized that proper effects, intelligently worked and carefully rehearsed were valuable adjuncts to a successful show. THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD is printing expert advice and opinion on the subject and exhibitors, who intend reintroducing sound effects cannot help being benefited by a careful reading of such articles.

THE scenario question will not down. There seems to be a sad lack of harmony and mutual good will between scenario writer and producer. No author is free from vanity and it is that kind of vanity, which winces at the slightest touch. Scenario writers complain of discourteous treatment and some have openly made charges, practically accusing the manufacturers of plagiarism, not to use the shorter and uglier word. The producers affect a lofty disdain or set up the cry of incompetency. The fact of the matter is that the scenario writing is in a state of transition and the complaints and recriminations are simply the pains of parturition, that betokens the birth of something new and better. The scenario is bound to win the recognition, which is due to it in the very nature of things. There will, in due season, be a happy meeting of the minds of producer and writer. In the meantime it would be well for the producers to show more indulgence and encouragement to the writers and to take an attitude of fostering and encouraging rather than antagonizing talent. Merit and talent gravitate to the front by an inexorable law, which even the scenario editor of a picture maker cannot abrogate or even change. The road is sometimes long, weary and thorny and we do not wonder, that some writers, whose only reward for well meant labor has been a printed rejection slip or a small check, get irritated and foam at the pen.

The Executive Committee of the International Exhibition of Social Hygiene, with headquarters at Rome (Via Borgogna 38), is offering two generous awards to film producers who will submit films of hygienic value. The competition will be open until November 1. The first prize consists of a gold medal and 5,000 lires, and the second prize is a silver medal and 2,000 lires. The prizes will be awarded by a special jury in the month of December.

The Overproduction of "Western Pictures"

By W. Stephen Bush.

OUT of the sixty odd releases, regularly used by American exhibitors, nearly one-third are so-called Western dramas. Very few of them show even average merit and only one or two of the manufacturers, who make a specialty of these productions turn out pictures above the average. Even in their productions, however, monotony begins to rear its deadly head. There are distinct limits to human skill and even the cleverest manufacturer cannot keep on producing pictures of "Western drama" without either repeating himself or coming in conflict with similar productions of his rivals.

Monotony is about the worst fault of any sort of amusement, but it is not only the only objection, which, on behalf of both the public and the exhibitors, we respectfully urge against continued over-production of these plays.

The Western picture seems a constant temptation to "realism" of a most undesirable variety. In their natural eagerness to give the public something new, a never-ending assortment of fresh thrillers and sensational episodes, the manufacturers, dealing in this specialty, give us too close a view of "hold-ups," hangings, lynchings, massacres and hair-raising, blood-curdling horrors generally. If the moving picture is to outgrow completely the current superstition, that it is an entertainment on the dime-novel order specially appealing to boys and tempting youth to crime, the pictorial representation of masked and armed highwaymen, practising their profession, of stabbing Mexicans and all the rest of this ineffably stupid "stage-craft" must be stopped. It is the one weak spot in the industry today, the only point, successfully inviting attack from outsiders. Surely the film-makers in this country possess enough inventive genius to replace this now absolutely hackneyed and threadbare variety with new features. The Western pictures, as a distinct specialty, have now been parts of regular releases for years and have lost their popularity. If the makers of these pictures have any doubt on that subject, it would be a boon to the industry to have them make an impartial investigation among the patrons of moving picture houses in any part of the country. These lines are based, not upon theory or speculation, but strictly upon facts, ascertained in personal research of the writer and others in various parts of the country. Women especially, always the friends of the moving picture, are utterly tired of them. Always the same plot, the same scenery, the same impossible Indians, the wicked halfbreeds, the beautiful red maidens, the fierce warriors, the heroic cowboys, the flight from the Indian village at night. The last scene, which is hardly ever omitted, is especially diverting. Either the "lovely maiden" or the "faithful squaw" steals out of the tepee, lingers among the sleeping Indians, at least one of whom is a restless sleeper and then making about as much noise as a monkey in a hardware store, escapes and warns the white man or somebody else, it does not really matter much whom.

There is no demand for these pictures. The field has been thoroughly exhausted. In the East especially the small boy alone continues to yearn for moving picture Indians and cowboys. In the state of Massachusetts even the real Buffalo Bill did very poor business on his last trip, simply because the "Wild West Amusement" needs a long rest. The same is true of other New England states. If people are tired of the real thing, they surely will not take to the shadowy representation of an imitation.

If a poll were taken today among exhibitors, the probabilities point to an overwhelming vote against a continued overproduction of Western stuff. Only the steadily diminishing number of such exhibitors, as are unduly impressed by the noise of the unwashed boys in the front seats, would vote the other way. Indeed only within a few weeks one of the most progressive and intelligent exhibitors, who owns a large number of theaters in the South, has written to THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD, protesting against this unabated inundation of so-called "Western drama."

It is said, that these pictures are made for the European market. A glance at the foreign trade papers furnishes ample proof of that fact. This is an explanation, interesting to public and exhibitors, profitable to the manufacturers, but it is far from being a justification or even an excuse. As long as the people of this country have to pay for seeing the pictures, their taste and their demands deserve the first, indeed the only consideration, quite regardless of the wishes and preferences of the European public. There can be no objection to the American manufacturers making pictures especially for the European market, whenever such pictures are for the exclusive use of the European market, but never otherwise.

A Test of Taste.

AN English critic and philosopher of some note has defined one of the first functions of the stage to be that of "raising to the highest point the susceptibility to disgust." Applied as a test, this axiom is an infallible guide to the state of the stage and of the public taste in matters of amusement anywhere and at all times. It is likewise a pretty sure indication of the moral character of a nation, which may be fairly judged by the nature of its amusements and the way it spends its leisure hours.

The stage of this country, judged by the standard just quoted, is scarcely, at this time, entitled to high praise. There are still too many ribald and inane musical comedies abroad, too much hearkening unto Ibsen and the rabid, unhappy gospel of Nietzsche.

How then does the moving picture stand the test?

"Susceptibility to disgust" implies high powers of discrimination and it must be admitted, that in the beginning of this great art and industry, there was but little discrimination and it took a good deal to provoke disgust. The morbidly sensational, the fantastic and absurd, the rough and coarse, the "shockers" and "bloodcurdlers" were the rule rather than the exception. The change that has taken place within a few years, both as to pictures and audiences, stands unparalleled in the world's history of amusements. We still have our "shockers," but from being the rule they have become an exception. Today it may be safely asserted, that the average moving picture audience is extremely "susceptible to disgust." It is in a spirit of no invidious comparison when we say emphatically, that this is far truer of the moving picture audience than the audience in the legitimate theater. On the silent stage it is impossible to gloss over a situation or a sentiment with cozening words. Where the gesture, the look, the position and attitude of an actor must be depended upon as the sole medium of expression, the least sin of taste, the faintest approach to the absurd or offensive tells with an effect, at once intense and immediate. If there is any susceptibility to disgust, the moving picture is in far greater danger to provoke it in the spectator than the performance on the stage, where the spoken word may always be depended on to redeem a questionable situation, to relieve a feeling of horror and take the edge of offense from the otherwise shocking or revolting scene.

It is due to the majority of American and foreign film makers to state, that the fear of exciting disgust has ever been present with them and has influenced them for good. There are comparatively few pictures today, that will not stand the test of the "susceptibility to disgust." No thanks to the censors for that. It is the deference to public sentiment and taste, arising from the conviction of the manufacturers, which is responsible for this wholesome state of affairs.

THE AUTHOR AND THE PRESS CLIPPING.

The other day the Essanay editor in returning a manuscript added a footnote to the effect that the story was too much like a recent press clipping, and the puzzled author writes:

"All the books I have on writing short stories and all I've read about writing scenarios mention the press clipping as a source of inspiration, yet now I am told that the story is returned because it is too much like a newspaper dispatch. Is it wrong to use newspaper articles in writing stories?"

Just to show that Mr. McMackin had "called the turn" the writer enclosed the clipping. It was a paragraph that had evidently been derived from a fiction story in one of the New York papers; the sort of stuff that is "put on the wire" when a dull Sunday fails to develop sensational news. It was a clever fake that will be used in the back country papers every little while for several years—and it made a good story because it was in itself a clever bit of fiction.

But it was precisely because it was the sort of story to attract attention to itself that caused the rejection of the scenario born of the fake, and that was what the correspondent failed to appreciate. The Essanay editor and most of the other editors had read the story as a newspaper clipping. If they had wanted to make a story of it they could have supplied better technique than the untrained author, but the story had gained too wide a circulation to make it worth while turning into a photoplay, and that was just where the trouble lay.

A writer in Munsey's Magazine made the matter clear some three or four years ago when he devoted several pages to an explanation of what his magazine did and did not want. He touched upon the matter of press clip stories and cited the then recent instance of a man who was literally blown up through the bed of the river while trying to stop a leak in a tunnel under the East River in New York.

Something more than a dozen stories, each featuring this incident, turned up in the Munsey offices alone, and probably a hundred went elsewhere, each merely a repetition of the incident which was familiar to every reader of the newspapers the country over. After the widespread publication in the daily press the story was stale. No fiction editor wanted a story that was stale and palpably a steal.

The experienced writer does not copy the idea into story form, least of all when it is the story that has been given black type heads in every paper in the country. The practised writer needs only a hint and the hint is as apt to be found in the two line personal as in the three column "spread." A writer, for example, reads an interesting article on stage effects. Perhaps he knows all about stage effects, but as he reads the article the idea strikes him that there might be a story about what happens when the effects go wrong. This was the inspiration for a story in which a stage crew vent their displeasure upon a young playwright by planning to upset the opening scene of the second act on the first night. The moon was green and the sky was purple; rocks heaved like the waves of the sea and all Nature was upset. They had overlooked the minor detail of the program announcement that the scene was laid in the land of Topsy Turvy. The audience thought it a clever conceit and the idea saved the play instead of ruining it. No relation could be traced between the story and the special article, and yet one was the outgrowth of the other. A five-line item in a column headed "interesting scientific facts" reminded an author of other correlated facts and a 28,000 word novelette was born. The particular scientific fact stated was not used, but it started the story.

That is what is meant when the beginner is advised that he can find inspiration in the newspaper columns. He is not supposed to copy the story but to make one from it, to gain merely the hint that will serve as a starter, and the further he gets away from the original paragraph the more probable is his success.

Playmaking

By Louis Reeves Harrison.

LET us try to find out what a large proportion of the audience wants. A few may enjoy a game of ball played by kids in a vacant lot, but those who are really enthusiastic about the sport, who attend daily by hundreds of thousands and are willing to put up a stiff price of admission, demand the finest quality of performance by trained athletes. This is true of all classes of outdoor amusements. A few may stand around and listen when a street-corner politician arraigns the trusts, but those who feel a deep interest in the adjustment of political conditions to modern requirements will pack a great hall to overflowing when a man of ideas has something to say that makes them think. A few may buy the comic papers and a few more those devoted to ponderous essays, but the great solid mass want the news of day, pictures of living men and women, accounts of what is actually transpiring, clear representations of life as it throbs in our midst. Weekly and monthly periodicals are piled high on the news stands, and they deal with subjects of infinite variety, but the highest piles are of the story magazines, and they have the largest circulation as do works of fiction in the public library. Drawing from all these sources some general indication of what most interests the people, it would seem that they want a well-acted story of these times containing an idea.

Opposed to any such common-sense summing up of what our people want we have the assertion often made by directors that the test of a play is how it will act. I think this is refuted by the fact that a great mass of theatrical rubbish on the stage and in the pictures is gone and well-forgotten never to be revived again that could be acted without much trouble. It is not a question of following old-fashioned and wearisome conventions in the camera presentations, of setting forth a lot of mechanical, unnatural and utterly impossible series of theatrical surprises and coincidences, which are supposed to make up the complexity of a "plot"—O much abused word—but of doing pretty nearly what our mothers did when we looked into their faces and begged them, "Tell me a story!" We are older and wiser now and most of us have the mental activity that has become a race characteristic; we are in the midst of tremendous business, social and political battles fraught with mighty issues, we are deeply interested in events as they concern us, and the story must be high in quality to satisfy our aspirations no matter how commonplace our achievements. While we do not expect the drama or the picture to be a mere servile imitation of nature it must have some artful resemblance to what we believe to be true. It must leave an impression on the audience that what is given is an inside view of lives that have been lived with all their thoughts, passions and emotions laid bare.

I cannot conceive of a finer method of getting a strong grip on the interest of the spectator than that of uncovering the hellish depths of human weakness in contrast with that honesty of intention which keeps most of us poor. It need not be shown in two characters opposed in conflict, but in the conflict that takes place in each solitary human soul, and it is sure to enslave attention when the struggle is such as we recognize as going on in ourselves. This can be shown sympathetically in the photoplay by letting a naturally fine character yield to debasing environment of tremendous force. The reason that it is rarely done is because of the traditional view that characters should not vacillate, whereas that is exactly what most of us do under temptation. Some of the finest elements of comedy and tragedy lie in the fluctuating nature of the average human conscience. Our lapses are very amusing at times, and at others are quite as mysterious as dreams. Doctor Freud of Vienna believes that man is influenced by two personalities, the minor one being recessive during our normal or conscious state and dominant when we dream—when the cat's away the mice may play. While a photoplay scenario dealing with man's vacillating nature or his dual character would stand small chance of being accepted, the subject is that of Shakespeare's "Hamlet" and Stephenson's "Strange Case of Doctor Jekyll and Mr. Hyde." The intelligent majority of every audience would enjoy such an occasional rift in the clouds. Just as the careless loveliness of natural backgrounds in the pictorial drama has made the worn-out trumpery of theatrical effect look ghastly, so such plays, illustrating and enforcing the most intensely dramatic elements in human nature, would have the warmth and glow of sunshine compared to the garish rays of artificial illumination.

Every playwright and every critic of intelligence knows the value of the conflict in dramatic presentations as we know that it is human nature to sympathize with the under dog. Therein lies the whole strength of the cowboy play. The fight decides matters in every rude civilization, and the spirit of contest is in all of us, but even the thrilling story of the oppressed female who is rescued after a series of hair-breadth escapes by the superhuman heroism of the leading herder of beefsteaks on the hoof may pall on the audience when it is unrelieved by a little variety. I confess to a sneaking sympathy for the wounded outlaw who is being hunted to death by a posse under a big sheriff with a tin star on his manly breast—the sheriff is the appointed guardian of something very few literary men possess—but the man who thinks has a right to be entertained at a theater just as well as the one who goes to cackle when the comedian sits down on a silk hat by mistake, and most plays are childish unless the incidents and situations in them are associated with one or another form of character development. People are not marionettes; each man and woman has a distinct investure of character that repels or interests us. When Charles Dickens received thousands of letters from people reading Old Curiosity Shop in serial form begging him not to let Little Nell die, it was because his masterly characterization had made his entire audience love the child of his imagination, and human interest is more strongly enlisted by the sympathetic attributes of a well-drawn character in the photoplay than by all the theatrical tricks and carpenter's devices known to the stage.

The first day's advance sale of tickets to the final contest between the two leading baseball clubs, amounting to over a hundred thousand dollars sent by mail, shows that our audiences are willing to pay for the finest quality of performance in any line of public amusement, hence the photodrama that exhibits all the essential qualities in harmonious conjunction is the one of largest and most permanent value to the exhibitor. This means that those eager to witness these high contests of skill keenly appreciate and enjoy what is supreme, not what is childish, petty, weak, or false, nor what calls for decadent study of vice, ugliness or disease in our social organism. Because I believe that moving pictures have come to stay and to exercise a widespread and tremendous influence to our detriment or for our betterment as a people I am consistently urging that their production be considered one of the most interesting and beautiful arts this old world of ours has ever enjoyed.

Reviews of Notable Films

"THE BLACK ARROW" (Edison).

Reviewed by W. S. Bush.

A TALE of love and adventure, with the War of the Roses as an historical background and the "English Greenwood" as its prevailing setting, is surely not unwelcome after the monotonous procession of impossible sheriffs, impossible Indians and impossible cowboys which seem to haunt so many studios.

"The Black Arrow" is an adaptation for the silent stage of the popular story of Robert Louis Stevenson. The story was originally intended and written for young folks and the picture will undoubtedly make a special appeal to the younger generation, for its hero is a boy and its heroine a girl. The work of adaptation presented difficulties, which few can realize unless they have read the book of Stevenson. As in all of his stories, there is in "The Black Arrow" much fine and graphic description and a variety of incident, not always closely connected with the central theme. An attempt to give the patron of the moving picture all the ramifications of the plot or even a complete portrayal of all its principal characters would have been impossible of achievement within the narrow limits of a thousand feet. The adapter has wisely avoided this temptation and in simplifying with considerable skill the plot, has by that means been able to transfer to the screen the greatest charms of the whole story; the spell of the "greenwood," the spirit of romance and chivalry and the hard yet picturesque fighting, for which the wars of York and Lancaster will ever be famous in English history.

The plot in its simplified form deals with the love of a likely young lad, "Dick Shelton," for a very brave and very sweet girl, "Joanna Sedley." A wicked knight, "Sir Daniel Brackley," is the obstacle in the course of true love. Being not only a bad guardian, but a ruthless tyrant and oppressor as well, he has rendered himself hateful to the people of his neighborhod, who as an answer to his acts of cruelty and robbery have formed themselves into a sort of medieval vigilance committee and are called "Black Arrows," many of them being skilled archers, sending vengeful shafts into the hearts of their enemies, who are Sir Daniel and his retainers. There are escapes and rescues and fights aplenty, but it all ends happily; the "Black Arrows" punish the despotic knight and the young people get married with every promise of a long and happy life.

One of the features of the reel is the great number of fine outdoor settings, remarkable for beauty of nature and splendor of photography, even in this day of good outdoor settings. The pursuit of Joanna and the scene entitled "The Last Black Arrow" are instances to the point and cannot fail to please, thrill and charm. The scenes in the greenwood, where "Dick" joins the brotherhood, sworn to destroy Sir Daniel, is superb in setting and grouping. The second feature has to do with the brilliant battle scenes, which in point of armor and weapons and in realistic acting, as well as in the number of the combatants, have scarcely been equaled on this side of the water. The attack on Shoreby Town is a masterpiece, the realism is intense, it is spirited in action and brings to mind scenes from the canvas of an old master.

It adds not a little to the merit of this truly notable picture, that the principal character is taken by an artist, who showed a fine conception of the part and who knew how to execute his conception in so perfect a manner. Harold Shaw was a "Dick Shelton" after Stevenson's own heart and fancy; he was youthful, yet manly; an admirable lover and a loyal partisan. The part of Joanna was well and understandingly acted by Natalie Jerome, while Charles Ogle gave a good impersonation of the wicked Sir Daniel.

Exhibitors will welcome such reels as "The Black Arrow." They attract the best and most desirable class of patronage and serve to increase the respect of the intelligent public for the moving picture, its destiny and its possibilities.

"THE WATER WAR" (American).
Reviewed by Jas. S. McQuade.

I WAS much interested in a private exhibition of "The Water War," a Western drama by the American Film Mfg. Co., which has an educational value in addition to a fairly strong story dealing with the "winning of the West."

The scenes are laid in Southern California, in the neighborhood of the big Sweetwater dam, which cost $12,000,000 in building. The concrete face of this dam is 268 feet in height. Great opposition was made by cattlemen and ranchers to the construction of the dam, as it shut off the free use of water to those located below it, but it has been instrumental in reclaiming many thousands of acres of arid land.

The producer of "The Water War" has made use of the history of the Sweetwater dam in the story, and we are given a view of the preliminary work on such a structure. The plain is dotted with graders, horses and wagons, and we see the smoke roll away from a certain spot where a dynamite blast has gone off. Of course, it must be borne in mind that the scene shown here was gotten up for the occasion, as the Sweetwater dam was finished several years ago.

The photography of this film is very clear and soft and several fine perspectives are shown.

The proverbial "shooting iron" is very much in evidence in "The Water War," and one sees the opposing factions engaged in what is almost a hand-to-hand conflict, which results in only two being rendered hors de combat. Westerners are not such poor marksmen as this scene would lead one to suppose; nor would old man Dolan, if he were a true Westerner, waste his ammunition on the clouds.

The parts of Margaret Dolan, Ed. Newton (the civil engineer), Tom Daniels and Dolan (the cattle baron) are capably enacted by Miss Pauline Bush, W. J. Kerrigan, Mr. Richardson and George Periolet, respectively.

From the first day that he appeared on the ground, with his assistants and instruments, to survey the site of the big dam, Ed. Newton, a civil engineer from the East, met with solid opposition from the cattlemen and ranchmen in that section of Southern California. The opposition was led by Michael Dolan, a wealthy cattleman, who had for his bodyguard a daring, cunning young man called Tom Daniels.

Dolan sent young Daniels to Newton bearing a message that all work must be stopped. That was on the afternoon of the first day. Newton immediately rode over to the Dolan residence and "had it out" with the autocrat of the valley. Heated words passed and the breach was made all the wider. Pretty Margaret Dolan overheard the conversation and was much impressed by the bearing and firmness of the young engineer.

Work was continued by Newton as if nothing had happened. A few days afterward Tom Daniels rode into the camp and handed Newton a letter, which contained the single sentence, "This is the last warning." Desiring peace, Newton sent one of his staff to Dolan with a reply. The man returned bound to his horse and senseless. Then the war was on.

Newton armed his men and awaited the attack behind sections of water pipe. In the fight Dolan and Newton are wounded, but the cattlemen are driven off. Newton is carried by his men to the Dolan home, where he is received and cared for by Margaret.

Tom Daniels is frenzied at the favor shown Newton, for he has long considered Margaret his own. She, however, has never given him cause for hope in that direction.

When almost recovered, Newton takes Margaret over the completed dam. Tom Daniels follows them with hatred in his heart and attempts to dynamite the great concrete wall. He is discovered just in the nick of time by Newton, and in a desperate hand-to-hand encounter is hurled over the wall and falls hundreds of feet below.

The release date of "The Water War" will be announced later.

The Picture as a Teacher.

With little encouragement from the manufacturers and still less from the exchanges, the motion picture is gradually being taken up by educational institutions throughout the country. Not a day passes that our mail does not bring evidence of this and also proof of the need of special distributing centers for such educational films as can now be obtained. As stated in these columns a few weeks ago, the General Film Company has established an educational bureau and work is now far advanced on a catalogue of films that will be available for use in schools, etc. As it is the first serious attempt along these lines there have been, of course, many difficulties to overcome, and we can only report progress.

Mr. John M. Bradlet, who was formerly on the staff of the Moving Picture World, and who is now proprietor of the Lyric Theater, Ottawa, Ill., writes us that the Board of Education of that city has arranged with him for a weekly show of industrial and educational films only. It is but fair to Mr. Bradlet to say that the attention of this Board was attracted to the possibilities of the picture as a teacher by the fact that Mr. Bradlet did the unusual thing of featuring educational films in his theater instead of the sensational. Mr. Bradlet deserves credit in no small measure for the favorable public impression he is helping to create. He is enthusiastic on the weekly educational show—provided that he can get the service—and says that he has reluctantly changed his source of supply recently because he could not get the films he wanted. It seems to us that the exhibitor is the one who ought to know what is suitable for his audience and has a perfect right to select his program and insist on getting it.

As if to offset the favorable report from other districts, we have just read a report of one board of education which had considered the installation of the picture, but their project has been laid on the table indefinitely. It seems that at one of their meetings a teacher reported that one of her pupils had voiced rather precocious ideas on divorce suggested by a film that featured a divorce court. It is to be regretted that manufacturers cannot see the harm they are doing to themselves in portraying the sensational or the doings of the underworld. True, we have these conditions always with us, but why should they be perpetuated upon the screen?

J. H. Farrington, of Saranac Lake, N. Y., dropped into The Moving Picture World office last week to announce the building of a new photo playhouse in his town. It is Mr. Farrington's intention to make this new house a model of its kind. It will seat 500 persons and project the best pictures by means of a Powers machine. Mr. Farrington is an old reader of The World and has a line on everything of the best in the business.

Advertising for Exhibitors

Conducted by EPES WINTHROP SARGENT.

TWO examples of advertising folders have been sent in by live exhibitors, both of which apply to conditions in the smaller towns or in cities where houses possess a purely community clientele.

The first of these comes from Charles F. Kear, who runs the Opera House at Minersville, Pa., and who writes: "I have tried all kinds of stunts, but this I find the best. The cost is $3.50 per thousand. If this is any good pass it along."

Mr. Kear not only has the right idea but the right spirit. If you have something that is good, "pass it along."

The folder consists of a sheet of thin card, 5 by 5½ inches, and folded once to give four pages, 2¼ by 5, a convenient shape for the vest pocket or a woman's handbag, and it's safe to say that every photoplay fan in Minersville carries one, for the card gives the list of films for two weeks in neat and compact form.

The cover page states: "On the inside of this you will find something to interest you. As it cost money to have this program printed, kindly do not throw it away. Keep it for future reference."

The first and third sentences are in larger type than the appeal, but the small type might be even smaller than the ten-point face used. It would crowd the title less and, by contrast, would attract more attention than it does at present. It might be objected that the statement that the folder is expensive suggests too close an economy, but this does not appear to be correct. The fact that it is worth enough to cause this appeal will give it added value to many minds. It is precisely the same idea adopted by some of the largest advertisers in printing a price upon advertising booklets.

Do Not Use Fussy Type.

The display is clean and effective, a type easily read without eyestrain and vastly different from the ornamental faces so dear to the hearts of some job printers. There are type faces so elaborate as to possess almost a pictorial value, but they detract from the force of the reading matter, and a clean-cut, easily read face is to be preferred. There is not a line in the Kear folder that cannot be read at a glance.

Inside there is merely the name of the house and it's manager, and a list of films, without comment, the two halves of the card being divided between the two weeks and giving only the title of the film and the name of the maker. The back page is devoted to Mr. Kear's insurance business, but ordinarily one or two trade ads could be obtained to very materially cut the cost of the cards if not show a slight profit. The back page should be easy to sell because it is something that holds interest for two weeks; not merely a thing to be read and thrown away.

The outside catch lines might be bettered, perhaps "Two Weeks" would suggest a more widely known publication, and the idea might be conveyed that within was the key to two weeks of solid enjoyment. Something to catch the eye would be useful in obtaining a first reading, but it is probable that the "regulars," to whom this especially appeals, have come to look for the cards, since it is a periodical issue.

Booming Advance Features.

The Blanchard Amusement Company uses a four-page folder to boom advance releases, and gets out something that would do credit to a larger town than Sunbury, Pa., where their People's Theater is located.

It is an attractive issue in every way, printed on fine gray paper in brown on the cover and black inside, the cover being ornamented only by a red line across top and bottom. It is probable that the stock is had with the red already printed in, but if there is more than one local impression on the cover the red might have been used a trifle more generously.

The one weak point with the cover is the front page, which bears only the legend "People's Theater" done in special script. "Good things coming" or "Treats to come" in type not too large would have helped to win attention.

Working Far Ahead.

The inside pages are given over to booming three special releases already announced and to announcement of the forthcoming Vitagraph releases of "David Copperfield," "Vanity Fair" and "Ivanhoe." The other releases are the Selig releases of "The Two Orphans" and "Lost in the Jungle" and the Kalem "The Colleen Bawn. The announcements are well worded and are given color by the use of the manufacturers' trade marks—including the Essanay Indian, which is cheating a little. Most manufacturers now furnish trade-mark cuts free or at cost, and they work up nicely in house advertising.

In place of flamboyant advertising that convinces no one, a restrained announcement piques curiosity. The Selig aimal picture, for example, states that "Selig owns more wild animals than any circus in the world and often uses them in pictures of this kind to great advantage."

That doesn't sound half as sensational as many managers would approve, but there is a quiet conviction that means a lot more than appears at a glance. It is the sort of thing that sinks in and "gets ripe" about the time the picture comes along.

Of "Colleen Bawn" it is said: "Every scene in this powerful Irish drama was made in Ireland," and the date of the first production of the play and its subsequent great popularity is alluded to, but a point is overlooked in not making use of the name of Dion Boucicault.

Of the Vitagraph forthcoming productions this mention is made:

The Vitagraph Company of America is working on "David Copperfield" by Dickens, "Vanity Fair" by Thackery, "Ivanhoe" by Sir Walter Scott. They will all be three-reel subjects and are the continuation of its literary films, the first of which was "A Tale of Two Cities," which met with such great success.

It is given here for the benefit of others.

Dignity Pays With Polite Patrons.

Were the People's located on some busy street where the transient trade was relied upon, the noisy advertising would be more effective. The Selig reel could be "circused" or the front painted green with Irish flags for "The Colleen Bawn," but the advertising is in keeping with the trade, and where a permanent clientele of polite people has been developed, the sensational is out of place. This folder will appeal alike to the banker and the butcher. It sounds a note of good taste that is in harmony with the aims of the management. The flimsy circular, hurriedly run off in a job office and distributed still wet from the press, has its place, but not in the better houses. This is better advertising than is done by most theatrical attractions, and more effective because it is.

The last page carries an appeal for the motion picture that can be used to good advantage by others. For that reason it is reproduced here.

The cinematograph is doing for the drama what the printing press did for literature, bringing another form of art into the daily life of the people.

It is a mistake to think that the amazing popularity of the motion picture is due altogether to the low price of admission.

Take a scenic film for instance; what an army of scene painters would be required to construct anything even approaching it in beauty. Would it be possible to reproduce the magnificent scenic beauties, the battles, the ride of cowboys or Indians, the evolutions of troops as they are seen in motion pictures on a theater stage? Scenes such as these can only be produced with Mother Earth for a stage, the sky for a canopy and the horizon for a background. If one would understand the popularity of moving pictures just think these things over and it can be seen that there is good reason for that popularity.

Make Your Screen Work For You.

Few exhibitors make really effective use of the most valuable means of appealing to the established clientele. The house program that carries its page of announcements is too expensive for the man who has a small house, but every theater has a screen and it can be put to advantageous use. There is a house in New York that runs five or six advertising slide between each two reels of pictures, but which never has a house slide. Other people are willing to pay for what is free to the manager, and their willingness to buy space does not even seem to give him a hint as to his own opportunity.

It is not difficult to make a good slide. Devices for making these are advertised in this publication and in Mr. Richardson's column operators tell how they handle the slide question. Don't get the idea that the Projection Department is just for the operator. Every manager should read it weekly, because projection should interest him as much as it does his operator. Look up the back files and you can get many slide hints and other wrinkles. Know about all the aspects of your house. You can hire an operator but you want to know if the operator is doing things right.

The writer recalls seeing the attorney for an important theatrical circuit stop on his way into the theater one night to show the porter how to sweep out the lobby. He was paid $500 a week for part of his time in keeping the legal affairs straight, but he was a big enough man to show a $12-a-week porter how to sweep the lobby in $500-a-week fashion—with brains as well as a broom.

Getting Back to Slides.

Whatever style of slide you elect to use have some prepared glass in the projection room where the operator can prepare a slide in a hurry. A panic was averted the other day by a quick-witted operator who guyed some persons who were leaving the house because a thunderstorm was raging and who were giving the others an idea that there might be a fire about somewhere. You may not stop a panic, but the slides will be useful. Slide glasses, smoothly coated with opaque, can be made up instantly and should be close at hand. Other slides may be more elaborately prepared in the office.

Useful slides are ones which carry a blank space for titles and which announce "coming soon," "to-morrow's feature" and similar advance events. The initial cost is small, so make your collection complete to cover all contingencies.

But you can announce more than titles. Talk to your audience through your slides. Keep in touch with them and keep them convinced that it is almost a religious duty to come and see the pictures every time the program is changed. Don't be content merely to announce "coming soon." Try something like: "The Moving Picture World says that 'Pushed From a Precipice' is a really notable film. We'll have it in a couple of weeks. Keep a lookout for it."

Use the Photoplayers.

Play up the personality of the players. It is possible to get slides of many if not all of the favorites. Use these to build up business. If you had Sarah Bernhardt booked for next week you would tell them she was coming. Run a slide that you've a Vitagraph coming with Miss Turner, and then flash Miss Turner's slide. It is more than doubly effective. You can find from the Vitagraph bulletin when Miss Turner appears.

Call attention to your new seats, the change in the hour of opening, the unusual quality of to-day's program (when you have an unusual one). Be chatty and confidential, but not familiar, and you'll find that your screen chat will do more to make you solid with your patrons than any amount of billboard advertising. It's your screen. Make it useful.

THE TIMELY STORY.

"This should be about the right time to send out Christmas stories," suggests one seeker after information, but is there any "right time" for stories about Christmas or the Fourth of July or any other festival. It is very true that each year manufacturers put out stories that deal with holidays, but the scenario writer who deals in stories of this sort is not apt to make much money with them.

The value of the timed story is questionable at best. The best subject should not be confined to any period, since the life of a film is from three to twelve months and the exchange and the exhibitor like best the story that will slip gracefully into the "commercial" list and not much reveal, through its title, the fact that it is six months old. Still, manufacturers make them and exchanges take them, and only the selling angle need concern the writer.

In many, if not most studios, the timely article is an afterthought. The manufacturer's daughter or the editor's wife wants money for an Easter bonnet and so the studio wakens to the fact that the Easter story should be hustled out. Someone around the place writes a hurried script and it is made overnight. Meantime the Easter stories have been going back to the writers and they have to rest for another year before taking up their travels, unless the holiday feature is removed and the story is remade into a general theme.

Just as a commercial proposition, it does not pay to write the timely story except on order. Leave that to the studio force and write the story that can be done in June or January. It's a safer hazard.

Professional muckrakers rise up everywhere to rail at the iniquity of moving picture shows. Anything to make a noise in a big city! Reformers always jump with both feet on anything that has received popular favor. When tomatoes were first discovered, growing lusciously on untrained vines, some alleged wise man called them "love apples," and declared they were highly poisonous, and that one tomato was sufficient to kill perhaps a hundred men. Still people managed to like tomatoes, just as they do moving pictures.—Passaic (N. J.) Herald.

CHICAGO LETTER.

By Jas. S. McQuade.

THE two great three-reel subjects, "The Two Orphans" and "Foul Play," are meeting with widespread popularity, and that other great three-reel subject, "The Colleen Bawn," promises similar results.

"The Two Orphans" had the disadvantage of being released on three separate dates, but it drew well nevertheless. Exhibitors who showed the three reels at the same exhibition have reaped much larger profits proportionately than did those who exhibited the reels separately and, besides, they have in several instances been able to repeat within a week, to record-breaking business.

While the majority of patrons have shown that they prefer the continuous exhibition of a three-reel subject, some exhibitors have preferred to run the reels separately, in conjunction with a mixed program. These exhibitors give as a reason that they cannot afford to run three-reel subjects where two of the reels are treated as specials. "We are in the business to make money and we find that we can do that best by giving our patrons a mixed program of one-reel subjects," they say.

"Why not raise the admission for these feature three-reel subjects and advertise strongly?" was asked.

"Our patrons would not stand for it," was the reply.

"But other managers are doing this and their patrons stand for it," was suggested.

"Yes, but just watch the attendance in such houses when the regular program at 5 cents follows the strongly featured program at 10 cents. It dwindles. Our people come as regularly as clockwork and are well satisfied, and we are satisfied."

"But you don't mean to say that some of your patrons are satisfied to see the last reel of a subject run off, without having seen the first or the second, as will unavoidably happen when the reels are run on different days?"

Even to this query these exhibitors have an answer, but its lack of intelligence forbids giving it space.

These great three-reel film subjects show the progress that is being made by the manufacturers. They are placing moving pictures in close competition with the best that is offered in amusements, and they will keep constantly adding to the number of people who attend the picture theater. They will attract the intelligent and the refined, where the ordinary film might fail. Where the intelligent and the refined are already patrons of a house, these three-reel subjects will bind them still more firmly to picture entertainment.

What is now needed to sustain enterprising manufacturers is intelligent co-operation from exhibitors. The intelligent exhibitor will prove one of the most important factors in the future of the film business. The film business is progressive; the exhibitor must be progressive or drop out of the race. To remain satisfied with his present profits is to permit a higher class man to supplant him. And the higher class man always appears when the opportunity is ripe.

"The Coming of Columbus."

A special exhibition of Selig's masterpiece, "The Coming of Columbus," was given Monday, October 9, for representatives of the city press. This magnificent three-reel subject was completed about two weeks ago, and this was the first view given since the films were put together.

I shall reserve for another time the reviewing of these remarkable films, which are destined to have world-wide exhibition. The scenes in the court of Ferdinand and Isabella are of stately splendor; the voyage of the Santa Maria, the Pinta and the Nina teems with trials that test the faith and courage of the great explorer; the discovery of land and the planting of Spain's flag on San Salvador thrill by their realism; the reception of Columbus on his return to Spain is a gorgeous spectacle; the banquet scene, where he rebukes a courtier by asking him to stand an egg on end, is a marvel of interior setting and rich costumes, and the return of Columbus in chains to Spain, after his last expedition to the New World, is full of pathos.

Chicago Film Brevities.

The Essanay special release of the "Athletics vs. Giants," in the World's Champion baseball series for 1911, will be made October 25.

Manager Whelan, of the Washington Theater, Cottage Grove and 43rd Street, ran "The Two Orphans" on Tuesday, October 3rd. Owing to the heavy rain that evening his receipts were diminished by about one-half. On Sunday, October 8, he repeated the reels, his box office receipts showing a total of $157.50.

Morris Fleckles, manager of the Laemmle Exchange, this city, returned from New York, Saturday, October 7, after an absence of eleven days. Mr. Fleckles states that the rental business of the exchange is very satisfactory and that his customers are well pleased with returns.

E. R. Plough, manager of the Anti-Trust Film Exchange, states that the volume of his rental business is much larger at the present time than it was for the same period last year.

F. L. Koppelberger, owner of the Majestic Theater, La Crosse, Wis., was in the city last week and arranged for service with the G. F. Co.'s branch at 117 N. Dearborn St.

Frank Cook, booking manager and publicity promoter of the Saxe houses in Milwaukee, Wis., was in the city recently and called on several of his numerous friends. He reports business very good in all the Saxe houses, S. R. O. being the rule.

The Dixon Brothers, of the Dreamland Amusement Company, Wabash, Ind., were visitors at the G. F. Co.'s branch at 117 N. Dearborn last week. It was merely a social call, as they get their service from the G. F. Co.'s branch at Columbus, Ohio. The Dixon Brothers own the Dreamland and New Irving theaters in Winchester, Ind., and also the Orpheum and Princess in Wabash, Ind. They report fine business at all their houses.

A. M. KENNEDY COMBINES WITH HARRY DAVIS.

Agreements were signed on Thursday, October 12, between A. M. Kennedy, formerly manager of the American Film Manufacturing Company, and Harry Davis, the motion picture and theatrical magnate of Pittsburg, Pa., for the organization of a new picture manufacturing company. Mr. Kennedy announces that there will be ample capital for the establishment of a fully equipped modern studio and factory. Contracts have already been signed by prominent theatrical stars for leading parts in the stock company of players. Further details will be printed next week.

Round About the Chicago Houses

By C. Young.

The Crystal Theater, at North and Washtenaw avenues, is one of the most successful straight picture houses in the city. It is one of the chain of Jones, Linick & Schaefer houses, its manager being Frank G. Schaefer. With a seating capacity of 800, it can afford to put on a film service of very high quality, and three reels of Licensed films, one, three and thirty days old respectively, furnished by the American branch of the General Film Company, form the program. Projection in this theater is of a high standard, and the pictures are very steady and fairly well lighted, though a better curtain would improve them. The throw is very long, somewhere about 100 feet, and the picture about 16 feet wide, which is a pretty large screen to successfully light with alternating current. Mention must be made of the music, which is of the order of the Orpheum, the members of the orchestra, Miss Alice Steinmetz, piano, and Mr. Henry Madaus, drummer, playing to the pictures quite in approved Orpheum style. I went out there on a recent evening to see Selig's "Two Orphans," and found at ten o'clock a line, or rather two lines, of people extending for half a block. The last show started about eight minutes past ten, and finished three or four minutes past eleven—this is certainly giving full time to the pictures, and a great deal better than accommodating the waiting patrons by rushing the three reels through in 35 minutes, as I saw done with two other three-reel productions at a certain theater in the loop some time ago.

The Queen Theater.

The Queen Theater, on North near Maplewood Ave., is a pretty house which has opened recently. Prominent on the sides of the canopy are the words, "Sunlight Pictures," and on investigation I found that they are really sunlight pictures, being projected on the Sunlight Curtain. Of course, it goes without saying that the projection is good. The screen is set at the back of the stage, giving the picture much depth. The operating room contains a double dissolving Motiograph equipment, which means a steady and brilliant picture in the hands of a competent operator. The picture at the Queen is soft and bright, and it is by no means difficult to make out delicate shades of facial expression even at the back rows. The side lights are not of the best possible design, as they contain orange lamps which are not shaded from the screen; as a result the shadows of the picture have a warm tone which is not quite like the photograph on the film. Green lamps would be very much better, as green light on the curtain does not injure the picture. Independent film service of a high class is supplied by the H. & H. Film Exchange. The proprietor of the Queen Theater, Mr. Herman H. Simons, and its youthful but enterprising manager, Mr. S. Mendelson, certainly have a house of which they may well feel proud. That the future of the Queen will be prosperous is attested by the fact that it is paying a profit, though opened only two weeks.

Oriental Theater.

The Oriental Theater, across the street, has a handsome exterior, but the interior is somewhat of a disappointment. The program consists of two reels and two vaudeville acts. The acts were not bad, as nickel-show vaudeville goes, but the films were. The first reel was a week-old Reliance, characterized by poor out-of-focus photography and a good deal of rain, and an Itala Foolshead, less than a month old, but looking like—well, junk, for that is what it was, being all rainy and cut. The exchange which supplies this house ought to look after its inspection department, and renovate its films occasionally, if it cannot keep them clean in any other way. Projection in this house, considering the poor condition of the films and the blueness of the Curtainyline curtain, is not so bad. That the manager seems to find it necessary to put on vaudeville is sufficient evidence that his pictures alone are not satisfying.

Orpheum Theater.

Orpheum Theater Again.—The Edison three-reel production of "Foul Play" was shown here on its release day, and made a great hit. The house was crowded all day, and early in the evening it was almost impossible to get a seat. Now, I enjoyed this production here very much, but for one thing. For the past year or so, the Orpheum Theater management has seen fit to allow a "candy butcher" to call his wares, first in a speech before the show starts, and what is an unmitigated nuisance, during the first half or more of the first reel. His shouts of "Lowney's 'Chah'cluts'" (That's how it sounded.) simply ruined the effect of the first reel of "Foul Play," as indeed they do for about every feature shown here. The stentorian voice offering "Just about a half a pound, only ten cents" can be heard all over the house, and there is no reason or excuse for it. He could call attention to the fact that he sells candy in a short "spiel" in the intermission, and sell his goods after that, even during the show, without making so much noise about it. It seems poor policy for the owners of the Orpheum Theater, who pay annually in rentals alone for their house the sum of $52,000 to risk displeasing the public for the sake of a few paltry dollars brought in by a means which mars the pleasure of their patrons.

While I am on the subject of the Orpheum Theater, I may as well mention several other points where there are shortcomings. In the first place, the picture is weak and dull, because insufficient current is used to make a bright picture. The latest thing there is the increase of the picture to 20 feet wide, and the picture is weaker than ever before, though it is projected on a new Sunlight curtain. Lyman Howe can project a much larger picture successfully, but he does not stint on lighting current, and his pictures are shown in a really dark house. The dark house is not desirable for many reasons, but the lights can be properly installed so as not to injure the picture. The indirect lighting system gets the blame for much of the poor quality of the picture, when it is really the improperly shaded lights on the sides of the balcony that nearly kill it. These ought to be properly shaded or extinguished.

As to the amount of current that ought to be used, to give some figures: The average 9 by 12 foot picture is projected with about 25 amperes of current, the light being distributed over about 108 square feet; with the 20-foot picture now at the Orpheum, the light is spread over about 300 square feet, three times the area. If amperage were in proportion to area of picture, the 20-foot picture would require about 75 amperes to obtain the same curtain brilliancy. I understand that the Orpheum uses 30 amperes for its pictures. Under the conditions, how can a brilliant, sunshiny picture be expected? The Sunlight curtain and the indirect lighting system form an ideal combination, but they cannot do everything.

Another thing, too: the pictures at the Orpheum are not as steady as they ought to be, though Powers Sixes are in use. Why? Because the intermittent sprockets are allowed to wear out. The pictures of "Foul Play" jumped noticeably, which should not be, as Edison films nowadays are works of art in photography and accuracy. Intermittent sprockets cost but a trifle to a house like the Orpheum, and unsteadiness in any picture ought not to be tolerated; so much the less, because the great magnification brings out every particle of inaccuracy in film or machine. This is no indication that Powers' No. 6 will not stand the grind; the intermittent action will, but the hardest wear comes on the sprockets in any machine.

These remarks are not intended as "knocks"; but the conditions as they exist ought to be corrected, and there is no better time than the present.

TEACHERS VIEW HISTORICAL FILMS.

Arrangements are being made to show Chicago teachers the value of the moving picture in lessons on history. An exhibition was given at which the teachers of this city and the Middle West were given a chance to see the manner in which the most difficult of lessons may be made bright and interesting to pupils who heretofore have not taken any particular interest in the doings of the past. It is expected in the near future that the moving picture will be used to great advantage in the teaching of a variety of school subjects. History is one of these that lends itself most easily to the use of the films, and it will be in the teachings of history that the first bid for the serious attention of educators will be made.

MORTIMER FILM CLEANING CO. REORGANIZES.

The Mortimer Film Cleaning Company, of Portland, Me., which manufactures a handy and inexpensive film cleaner, has recently been reorganized and is now in position to take care of a more extensive business. The Mortimer Film Cleaner is now in use in every part of the country and many enthusiastic testimonials have been received by the manufacturers commending its work. For simplicity, this device has no equal. It is easy of operation and easy to buy. Not only is it indispensable in the exchange but it is within reach of the exhibitor and could be used to advantage by them when dirty film happens to come from the exchange. Write to the makers at Portland, Me., for information and prices.

Commissioner Thompson Heard From

Explains Present Status of Operators in New York City—Says Apprentice Requirement Stands Uutil Appeal is Decided.

Recently is was announced in the Moving Picture World that the law requiring operators to serve an apprenticeship of six months before they could obtain a license to work in New York City had been declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court. Since that announcement an appeal from the decision mentioned has been taken by the Department of Water Supply, Gas and Electricity, under which jurisdiction the issuing of operators' licenses comes. Consequently, until the appeal is decided, the six months' apprenticeship must be complied with. On this subject Commissioner Henry S. Thompson, chief of the department, has addressed a communication to the Moving Picture World as follows:

October 4, 1911.

Editor Moving Picture World,

Dear Sir: May I ask you to publish prominently the following memorandum as to the present status of our work in licensing moving picture operators:

1. Citizenship is no longer required.

2. No license can be granted unless the applicant shall have served as an apprentice under a licensed operator for at least six months, and before beginning such apprenticeship, the applicant must register his name and address, together with the name and license number of the operator under whom he intends to serve. He must also either bring the operator with him, or bring the operator's license certificate and a statement that he is willing to accept the applicant as his apprentice.

An apprentice is a person who serves another in order to learn a trade, art or profession.

The constitutionality of the apprenticeship feature of the law has been questioned in the courts. A decision has been handed down, but an appeal has been taken by the city from this decision, so that apprenticeship will be required for several months longer at least.

3. The above requirements do not apply to persons who have held 1910 licenses.

Persons who have not taken the 1910 examination cannot be examined until they shall have served an apprenticeship.

4. During the forenoon only of each business day, the department is receiving, at Room No. 1720, Park Row Building, registrations of apprentices, and is issuing acknowledgments of these registrations which will authorize the apprentice to be and remain in the booth and to operate the machine under the immediate supervision of the operator, who must, however, remain in the booth while the machine is actually in operation.

Respectfully,

HENRY S. THOMPSON,
Commissioner.

O'KALEMS DINED.

Returning Photoplayers Welcomed Home by Friends and Given a Square Meal at Marsullo's.

It was a particularly tired and hungry bunch of picture people that arrived in New York on the big White Star liner Cedric last Saturday. They were members of the now famous O'Kalems returning from a four months' picture making campaign in the Emerald Isle. The home-coming trip had been unusually rough and even the big Cedric felt the stress of the passage.

Hoping to alleviate the distress of the picture folk, a "small and early" dinner party was organized and tables were laid at Cafe Marsullo in 24th Street, and it was a very happy company that sat down to them about 8 o'clock Saturday evening. Those present were:

Mr. Sidney Olcott, Miss Gene Gauntier, Mr. Jack Clark, Miss Agnes Mapes, Mr. and Mrs. George Hollister, Mr. J. P. McGowan, Mr. Robert Vignola, and Mr. Farnum, all of the O'Kalem, and Mr. William Wright, general sales manager of the Kalem Company. Among the invited guests were Mr. Eugene V. Brewster, editor of the Motion Picture Story Magazine, and Mrs. Brewster; Mr. J. P. Chalmers, editor of the Moving Picture World; Manager Rosenbluh, of the Greater New York Film Exchange, and Mr. and Mrs. George Thomas.

When the O'Kalems had been properly fed, Mr. Wright, acting as master of ceremonies, called upon Mr. Brewster for an address of welcome. If there was any lack of good humor in the party it was quickly dissipated by the well-suited remarks of Mr. Brewster, who paid a high but deserved tribute to the good work of the players.

Mr. Olcott and other members of the O'Kalems told bits of their experiences while in Ireland and while all of them said they had a fine time, they agreed that there was no place like home and that they were glad to be back.

Remarks were also made by Mr. Chalmers, Mr. Rosenbluh and Mr. Thomas.

The evening passed most pleasantly and the party broke up at 11 o'clock to give the very tired O'Kalems a chance to get a good night's sleep—something they were unable to get on shipboard.

The Ramdon Shots of a Picture Fan

I like not this excess of virtue in the photoplay. Souls with jeweled movements are few and far between, and men and women in the flesh have no occasion to have their heads measured for a well-fitting halo. In too many photoplays the sons of Adam and the daughters of Eve possess all those superlative virtues and that innocuous perfection which is generally found in inscriptions over tombstones. I am moved to speak thusly by reason of a play called "For His Father's Sake." A nice looking young man sacrifices his honor and reputation and imperils his liberty all on account of a step-father. Then he goes West, gets engaged to a girl and gives her up without a whimper. The girl is willing to marry a man, whom she hates, because the villain has it apparently in his power to hurt her lover. Such perfection may exist in the fine-spun theories of platitudinous philosophers, but flesh and blood never lives up to such theories.

Have you ever tried to guess whose picture it is when you came in during the running of any particular reel? Of course, if you know the faces by heart, you know right away, but suppose you have a poor memory for faces and you do not see the trademark. Could you tell then? I think almost any fan ought to say "yes" to the question. The easiest to tell, I think, is the Biograph. No matter if you do come in the middle of the reel, you feel a very subtle but quite electric tension. You cannot help understanding; no use talking, they know how to handle the moving picture alphabet and are past masters in moving picture advanced grammar. They can disguise the settings of the studio to perfection. It's quite different with some other makers. You can tell them by the studio ninety-nine times out of a hundred. Now, a Kalem is easy to tell by the outdoor setting. That is a good thing to be known by—a characteristic that is always popular with the fan. You would not think it easy to tell a Gaumont from a Pathe. Superficial appearances to the contrary notwithstanding, it is to an old fan just a matter of about thirty seconds. The Gaumont people more often than not are less stagy and run more to outdoor settings and in the matter of choosing fine outdoor settings commend me to this company that has made such wonderful strides. In the matter of elegant interior settings, the Pathes are perhaps a shade better. There is, too, a striking difference in their tinting. In the matter of costumes and makeup, the Pathes are still unrivaled among the foreign picture makers. The titles of the Pathes are nowadays gotten up in intelligible English and in that respect the Gaumonts have frequent lapses.

It hurts me and other fans as well to see a big, reputable film concern do anything that at all looks like and approaches "faking." A short picture, recently released and called "Among the Japanese," was incorrectly and misleadingly labeled. It should have read "Among the Japanese in Chicago." "Orientals Tramping Around the Studio" would have been another good and appropriate title. It is impossible to take pictures of Tokyo and Osaka in Chicago. The number of critical and sharpeyed fans is increasing every day and they know enough to know that pictures of Japan should be taken in Japan.

P. F.

Messrs. Klaw & Erlanger, prominent theatrical magnates, who possess the sole right of the Ben Hur production, and who have recently brought suit against the Aladdin Amusement Company, of Springfield, Mo., for exhibiting a moving picture production of Ben Hur, have been advised by their counsel that the defendant has confessed exhibiting same and as a result has offered $150 and costs for their two previous unauthorized exhibitions. No doubt every exhibitor throughout the United States is aware of the prohibition of the use of this film, but it seems that some promoter sooner or later gets foolish and is caught in the bargain. This is not the only suit brought about by K. & E., as other like cases are pending in courts of various states.

A Jewish moving picture syndicate has been incorporated in New York City, which will present Jewish subjects exclusively. A company of Jewish actors has been engaged, which will be under the direction of S. Golden.

Education and Science

SIMPLIFYING THE TEACHING OF HISTORY.

By W. Stephen Bush.

All knowledge, the acquisition of which depends more directly on the senses, may be taught more effectually through pictures than the printed page. Without giving the principle its widest possible application and confining these remarks to one subject alone, for the purpose of a clearer demonstration, it may be stated that history can be taught with greater advantage by moving pictures than by means of the movable type, provided of course the making of such pictures is placed in competent hands. This applies both to elementary and to advanced studies in history.

The essential and not the least valuable part of historical studies is the understanding of the manners of a people, of their views of life, as made manifest in striking events of their history; of their costumes, their habits, their pleasures, their social and political institutions. The government of the United States is at the present time utilizing the moving picture as an accurate historical record by having pictures made of such original Indian life, manners and customs as may still be observed within its dominions.

There is no lack of historical knowledge and scholarship, which may do for the students of the past what the government is now attempting to do for the students of the future. In the study of the two great civilizations, which still form an integral part of our social, scientific and literary fabric of to-day, the moving picture would simplify matters immensely and besides give the students far more vivid and lasting impressions than the most eloquent description in type. The distinct phases of these two civilizations could, under the guidance of scholars, historians and experienced pedagogues, be made plain to the average student in comparatively few pictures. These few pictures, properly explained, might then take the place of a hundred text books. Take an elementary course in Greek history for example. Let two great pictures be made, one representing the Homeric age, the other representing the Periclean age. The leading incidents of both ages would constitute the parts of the picture, which may be lengthened out to say three or four thousand feet of film, as the exigencies of the case may seem to require in the judgment of the experts. Patrician Rome, Republican Rome, Imperial Rome might, roughly speaking, constitute another course in moving pictures.

In the production of such reels of historical knowledge, the co-operation of the best scholars, historians and pedagogic experts could no doubt be secured, for there is not an atom of controversial matter in any of these subjects.

Coming to the Christian era and the middle ages and at last within hailing distance of our own times, the difficulties would perhaps be greater, but they would by no means be insuperable. Even the crude efforts of film makers, who had no assistance from competent scholars, constitute convincing proof, that in competent hands the historical film will develop into an educational factor of incalculable value. Out of even these crude films much could be learned of the costumes of the people, for in that detail even the layman is bound to make an effort at being accurate. I could name a number of such historical pictures, which, while manifestly full of imperfections, are not without a certain educational benefit to all who see them. One company of film makers, the Edison Company, has lately attempted to film interesting events in Revolutionary history, and while there is too much of the "historical novel" idea about some of the films to make them of any real value to a class of children or to a student of history, they posses one meritorious feature in showing the actual locality where the events sought to be portrayed have taken place. This is notably true of the picture showing the capture of Fort Ticonderoga. All the scenes in the picture were taken on the site where the fort stood and where the capture and the scenes leading up to it actually occurred.

What is true of history applies with equal force to geography, which indeed has always largely been taught by pictures, but never systematically by moving pictures of things, places and men, taken on the spot and reproduced just as taken in an other part of the globe. It is equally obvious that the exact sciences can be taught most effectually by moving pictures. As soon as scholars, scientists and educators realize the possibilities of the picture as a teaching agent, practical steps will no doubt be taken to change these possibilities into realities. In several states in the union there has been lively agitation to enlist the picture as an aid and factor in popular education, and the legislature of Wisconsin has at its last session appropriated a large amount of money for the purchase of educational films and moving picture machines to be used in the schools of the State.

IMPORTANT MOVEMENT IN GERMANY.

Some time ago, says the German trade paper, "Der Kinematograph," published at Dusseldorf, Dr. Edgar Alfred Regener and Director v. Hanstein, of Berlin, have organized a committee for the purpose of inducing eminent men of science to give lectures on moving pictures of a scientific character. This committee is a branch of the society called "Science For All," which has among its officers several high and distinguished officials of the Prussian government, an admiral in active service, a number of professors at various universities, among them Professor Hugo Muensterberg, the well-known "exchange professor" at Cambridge, Mass. The King of Wurtemberg has accepted the office of honorary president and has consented to open the first exhibition, which is to take place in Berlin in a few weeks at the latest. The exhibition is called by the German paper "Academic Course of Instruction by Cinematography." The committee has succeeded in inducing Count Zeppelin, of "dirigible" fame, to deliver a lecture on aeronautics, which will be accompanied by a series of very interesting and brand new moving pictures. Lectures on pathological subjects have likewise been prepared and the pictures showing experiments with serum are all ready. Assistants of the late Professor Koch are busy with taking pictures, intended to illustrate the symptoms, development and cure of the so-called "sleeping sickness." Exhibitions are to be given three times weekly, two on week days and one on Sunday. The price of admission is about fifteen cents in American money. The public generally is invited to attend.

THE GROWING OF A PLANT.

Another instructive Pathe film illustrates the growing of a plant. Attention is drawn to the fact that the picture shows the plant's growth as being 800 times faster than is its natural time to germinate and develop. Beginning with the seed, from which the small root is seen pushing its way down into the soil and throwing out other roots, the seedling begins to develop and its upward growth is very plain.

A full-grown plant of the Peninsula variety is next shown, upon which the flowers grow in almost a magic-like manner, but the rapidity of the growth does not rob it of its naturalness, and it is most interesting to watch the growth of the stem and the appearance of the buds and their further opening into the full flower. A flower of the hyacinth family is next shown; it is evident that this is a flower which is especially selected for its adaptability to the science of cinematography. Rising up from its cup-shaped cluster of leaves, the flower grows and unfolds it many bell-shaped, lily-like flowers, until it has attained its full height, presenting a pleasing appearance, and recording a beautiful illustration. A group of full-grown flowers is next used for the especial purpose of showing the effect of the Autumn winds upon them.

Swaying and bending until they cannot again stand upright they shed their seed upon the ground and thus secure their own reproduction another season, conveying to the student the idea of the value of the wind in causing plants to shed their seed and continue their own life from year to year. Lovers of flowers and nature, together with students, will value these pictures; to the children they are exceedingly instructive, and to those who have no educational tastes (if such there be) the whole series is very beautiful.

By CLARENCE E. SINN

A DRUMMER writes: "I am thinking of buying a complete outfit of effects and going on the road playing two or three night stands. I am experienced in putting on sound effects. It is a work that I like. Now I want your advice; do you think it would pay me to buy a complete outfit and work the way I mentioned, and what salary do you think I ought to ask for doing the above?" (I omit the name and address of the writer.)

Giving advice is an easy matter; giving sound, practical advice is another thing. It's almost as hard as following any kind of advice, which is the hardest proposition of all. There are many things which would have a bearing on the question in the above letter. In the first place, he evidently has no outfit of his own, though he says he is an experienced man. One would think he would like to have a complete outfit of his own just on general principles, even if he did not undertake the venture in question. But aside from that, I think if it was myself contemplating this thing, that I would address the people I expected to do business with—i.e., the managers. A neatly written form letter setting forth my proposition briefly and exactly would probably be an inexpensive starter. Have this printed on a good quality of paper (no cheap work) and mail it to managers of moving picture theaters. I should figure as nearly as possible my probable weekly expenses and add a fair wage to that in order to arrive at an idea of the remuneration to be asked. It might be considered good business to add interest on money invested, but that is a matter which would depend upon other circumstances. There are two proverbs, trite but true, which are applicable. First: "Nothing venture, nothing win." Second: "Begin nothing of which you have not well considered the end." I should suggest to the writer that he first post himself thoroughly; second, to be sure he can deliver the goods. Then get out and toot your horn—let folks know you have the goods. I might also call your attention to the fact that the Moving Picture World is the one medium through which to notify moving picture people that you have something in the moving picture line, whether buying or selling. This young man contemplates selling his services, talents and experience to managers of moving picture theaters. This paper is read by every one of them in North America and most of those in other English speaking countries.

The following suggestions are offered:

"Foul Play" (Edison), First Reel.

1. Neutral till change of scene.
2. Livelier (any intermezzo) till Robert exits.
3. Dramatic till "Robert's Father."
4. Same as No. 1 till "General Rolleston and His Daughter."
5. Bright waltz till check is shown.
6. Neutral (something like "Passion," by Helf & Hager) till two men enter.
7. Semi-pathetic ("Apple Blossoms") till "His Guilty Conscience," etc.
8. Pathetic till "Convicted for Another's Crime," then
9. Dramatic (softly) till jury stands up; increase in intensity till Robert's father goes to him.
10. Pathetic till close.

Second Reel.

1. Neutral ("Little Trifler," by George Bernard) till change.
2. Hurry, p. and f., according to action, till shake hands.
3. At change of scene, soft agitato till Robert conceals pistol and exits.
4. Waltz till Bulletin Board.
5. Intermezzo till "Wylie, mate of the Prosperine."
6. Short mysterious (heavy) till change.
7. Neutral till "Preparing to Sink the Ship."
8. Mysterious-gloomy, till "Land at Last."
9. "Autumn Breezes" (Leo Feist) till "Land at Last."
10. (Warning cue: "Where is Helen?") Wait till Arthur sinks in chair, then dramatic music till close.

Third Reel.

1. Intermezzo, "Martinique" (by Loraine) till "General Rollinson Leaves to Search the Seas."
2. Agitato (for vision) till change of scene.
3. "Reign of the Roses" (by Ellis Brook) till "Helen Tells Robert's Father of His Safety."
5. "Reconciliation" (by Theo. Bendix) till Robert climbs aboard ship.
6. At change to street scene, Wylie recognizes Robert, agitato till "Justice at Last."
7. Dramatic till shot.
8. Pathetic till close.

Through courtesy of Mr. Grover Kayhart, I am enabled to submit the following suggestions of appropriate music to be used in Kalem's pretentious release, "The Colleen Bawn":

"Colleen Bawn" (Kalem), First Reel.

1, Paddy Carey. 2, St. Patrick's Day. 3, Wearing of the Green. 4, College Hornpipe. 5, Irish Washerwoman. 6, Come Haste to the Wedding. 7, The Girl I left Behind Me. 8, My Lodgings on the Cold Ground. 9, Colleen Bawn. 10, The Brown Maid. 11, Aileen Aroon. 12, Gramachree.

Second Reel.

13, Lough Sheeling. 14, The Fairy Boy. 15, The Song of Sorrow. 16, Killarney. 17, The Dear Irish Boy. 18, Pretty Girl Milking Her Cow. 19, Crooghan a Vence. 20, Kathleen Mavourneen. 21, Molly Bawn. 22, Woods of Green Erin. 23, The Groves of Blarney. 24, Moll Roone.

Third Reel.

25, I'm Leaving Old Ireland. 26, Shamama Hulla. 27, I Once Had a True Love. 28, 'Tis the Last Rose of Summer. 29, The Angels Whisper. 30, Low Backed Car. 31, Cushla Machree. 32, Fagan. 33, Kitty Tyrell. 34, Kathleen Aroon. 35, Cean Dubh Delish. 36, Sly Patrick.

For the benefit of those who have not these numbers or are unable to get them, I will explain that Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 22, 30, 33 and 36 are lively tunes. No. 8 is also known by the title, "Believe Me If All Those Endearing Young Charms." Nos. 9, 11, 15, 16, 18, 20, 23, 25, 28, 29, 31 and 34 are sentimental and plaintive in character. No. 23 ("The Groves of Blarney") is said to be an ancient Irish tune from which Thomas Moore took the melody, "The Last Rose of Summer." The other numbers are characteristic Irish tunes, and are all very appropriate.

MORE HELP FOR PICTURE PIANISTS.

Elsewhere in this issue will be found the advertisement of Mr. Walter C. Simons, who has something of interest to say to pianists who are playing in picture, vaudeville and dramatic theaters. Mr. Simons is qualified to give instruction as to the proper method of playing picture and vaudeville accompaniments. He has filled the position of pianist in various theaters of the West and was pianist for Lyman Howe for one year; he also has a number of song successes to his credit, which places him in the composer class. Wherever Mr. Simons has appeared, either in pianologue or as accompanist, his work has been characterized as a feature of the entertainment by the critics. He is a young man of pleasing address and speaks with authority upon his chosen subject.

HANDSOME LOBBY DISPLAY FOR "HANDS ACROSS THE SEA."

Two special posters, one mammoth lobby hanger, a complete set of 8 x 10 actual photos and an interesting eight-page booklet, liberally illustrated, make up the line of advertising matter prepared for the new American Eclair Company's initial production in two reels, "Hands Across the Sea in '76." The posters and lobby hanger are superbly lithographed in six colors, the latter measuring 42 x 84 inches and is the first of its character ever made to order by a lithographer for a regular release. The photos are intended for display in frames in theater lobbies, while the booklets may be secured from the company in quantities for local distribution.

All exchanges will display an advance showing of samples, and bookings for the production should be made early to avoid disappointment.

The Song and the Singer

By CLARENCE E. SINN

WHEN I called at the Thompson Music Publishing Co.'s offices (145 N. Clark St.) and asked for news, they said, "Have you heard Ray Samuels sing that 'Honkey Tonkey Monkey Rag'?" I hadn't then, but made it my business to do so. She was singing over at the Lyda Theater, way out on 48th Avenue, but I needed no guide to show me the way—all I had to do was to locate the big noise, and that was the audience applauding Ray. "The Rag Time Kid." She is a riot and then a few. She has a fine vehicle in the "Honkey Tonkey Monkey Rag" (one of the hits of the house of Thompson) and she makes the most of it. A unique dance she introduces in this number adds not a little to its success, but the fact remains that the "Monkey Rag" is an easy winner. There are a lot of good Thompson songs on the market now, but they are playing this one for first place and show and it looks like a safe bet all around. It is one of their best sellers and you who have not yet been captivated by its peculiar rhythm and melody will be before the season is over, for like Gene Fields' Goblins, "it will git you if you don't watch out." At a song contest held at the Saratoga last week, Ray Samuels took nine encores and the prize with "Honkey Tonkey Monkey Rag." This is the same number that Miss Sophie Tucker put over in fine style at Hammerstein's Victoria while in New York. I didn't hear her, but the reports were good—and you know what Miss Tucker can do with a live song. Earl Flynn, who played in the "Merry Merry" with Miss Tucker is also featuring this song.

Margaret Marlow and four Picks are taking five and six encores with the "Monkey Rag." I hear Miss Marlow is revising her act and will add another Thompson song.

Les Copeland, of Dockstader's Minstrels, will feature a new Thompson song which he now has in rehearsal. "Monkey Rag" will be given a conspicuous place on the bill.

I can't remember a season which has been so replete with good catchy songs as the present one. The publishers are delivering the goods and if our singers fail to "put 'em across," it will not be from lack of material. Leo Freidman, whose name is a household word, has a couple of encore getters in "Hurry Back, Dearie," and "Be Good," and has just turned out another one that is a pippin. "When You Look for the Eyes That Are Looking for You"—that's the name of it, and when you hear it you will sit up and take notice. Leo Freidman writes and publishes his own songs, and starts them on their merry way, and when they look like a good safe investment, turns them over (for a small consideration) to some other publisher, and thereafter has nothing to do but lean back and hire a clerk to count his money. Isn't Leo the philanthropic boy? The other day a dreamy-eyed youth called on him with a manuscript of an "original" song he wished to dispose of. Leo ran his eye over it. "Where did you get this?" he asked. "Out of my head," was the reply. "All alone?" "Yes, sir," was the proud reply. "I congratulate you," said Leo. "Why, if a thing like that ever got in my head I'd have to send for the doctor."

Talking about good songs, there has stepped into the limelight recently a young Southern composer, E. Clinton Keithley by name, with a song which bears all the signs of a long, steady seller—one of those songs folks like to hear today and next week and next year as well. "A Garland of Old Fashioned Roses" is the title. Take a peek at the chorus:

"A garland of old fashioned roses, sweetheart, I bring to you.
Roses I gathered in love-land, dreaming sweet dreams of you.
Each rose, dear, a message is breathing, tender and fond and true,
This garland of old fashioned roses, sweetheart, I bring to you."

Hasn't that got the real sentimental savor? The words are by C. H. Musgrove, and Mr. Keithley has given them a beautiful musical setting. The song is published by Forster, Music Publisher, 130 S. Wabash Avenue, with offices in the Grand Opera House Block, Chicago. He has recently taken over the catalog of the Johnson Publishing Co. This includes among other songs: "I'll Meet You on the Golden Shore," "Some Day You'll Love Me," "The Girl for Me," and "Lucy Lee," but the number they are concentrating upon is "Garland of Old Fashioned Roses," and I believe their faith in this number is justified. Mr. E. Clinton Keithley is manager for the Forster Music Publishing Company. In addition to being a composer he is also a singer of ability and has sung with "Natiello and His Band," "Kirkhamp's Band" and other high-class organizations.

Betts & Binner (H. B. Binner, Mgr.), Suite 506, 145 N. Clark St., are in the procession with a bunch of songs which look good to me. The numbers which caught my eye were "Oh, That Musical Dream" (a rag-song, also suitable for a "double"), "Someone Dreams of Someone" (ballad), "Laughing Eyes" (Indian song), and "That Funny Melody" (rag). I have had no opportunity of hearing these numbers sung in public as yet, but have heard good reports from uninterested people and, as I said before, they look good to me. I shall review them further at another time. The following singers are doing the "publicity" work: Jerry Sullivan, Geo. A. Little, Morris La Vail, Aaron Roth, and C. Wynne Patterson.

Then there is "The House of Ballads." You know where, what and who that is; sure. Everybody knows. On the door it reads: "Tell Taylor, Music Publisher, Room 40, Grand Opera House." That is the Chicago office, of course. Now if Tell Taylor had never given us anything more than "Down by the Old Mill Stream," that alone would have been sufficient warning for calling his factory "The House of Ballads," but it is not his only song; not by a jugful. He has written and published a bale of high-steppers, and as I heard he was just putting out a few new ones, I thought I would run up and tell—don't hit me. I wasn't going to make that gray-whiskered pun on his name. It was Charley Hudson I wanted to tell about this new department in the Moving Picture World. Charley is the local representative for Tell Taylor. "Hello, Sinn," says he, "What can I do you for?" Just kidding, you know; Charley wouldn't "do" anybody or—I came near saying "anything," but that would be wrong, for Charley Hudson does things. Anyhow, I found him all enthused up about the new Tell Taylor catalogue in general and "When We Were Sweethearts" in particular. "It's a peach," said he; "wait till you hear it." I did. It is.

This is a companion to "Down by the Old Mill Stream" and they expect it to make as big a hit. "It may interest you to know," said Charley Hudson, "that 'Down by the Old Mill Stream' has just passed the half-million mark." It did interest me, and I believe it will also interest the multitude of singers who helped this song to pass the half-million mark.

Other encore getters in their new catalog are "Davy Jones and His Monoplane," a new up-to-date monoplane song, "The Roses of Erin," a beautiful ballad of "Forty Years Ago," (March song) and "Fare-Thee-Well," a "toot-toot" song with train whistle effect.

Walter Sherwood is featuring the great waltz ballad, "When We Were Sweethearts," with Al. G. Fields' minstrels.

Bob and Alice Longley are featuring "Roses of Erin" over the Orpheum circuit.

A card from Aurora, Ill., says: "Just saw 'The Three American Comiques' at the Fox Theater. They are using 'Davy Jones and His Monoplane.' Biggest thing on the bill—an absolute riot." (Tell Taylor, publisher.)

Chas. E. Hay, Jerome H. Remick's star band singer, took charge of the States Vaudeville, Saturday, Sept. 30th. This is Mr. Hay's third season as manager at the States.

"Oh, You Beautiful Doll" was being sung and featured in thirty-five different Chicago theaters last week. Thirty-five at once in the same town is going some. (Published by Remick.)

The Loos Bros. (Ernie and Billie) are scoring with their novelty medleys of choruses from the Remick song catalogue. Ernie says they have some more catchy ideas in reserve.

The slides to the Remick song hit, "Navajo Rag" are out. This may well be called a "novelty" set; they are great. The song promises to be a successor to the famous "Alamo Rag" produced by this house last year.

Blood & Koehler have stretched their arms, taken à deep breath and plunged into the season with their hip pockets full of Good Ones. Equipped with Viola Victoria, George Lewis, Chas. Glaskin and a host of new songs, they are confident of a big year. Among the new ones is a winter number that's a go, entitled "In Snow Time, Dearie." Another is "Your Heart." Glaskin says this song is the greatest little hand-getter that has happened "since the golden days of Mark Antony—whoever he was."

Blood & Koehler have incorporated for $100,000 and expect to move from their present quarters to a more spacious home further down the Rialto.

Max Reinold is still with the Harold Rossiter Music Co.

READING SCRIPTS.

A correspondent wants to know how long it should take to get action on a story submitted one of the companies. He complains that he has had to wait two and three weeks.

Some people do not know when they are lucky. Experienced authors allow four or six weeks before they make inquiry, but usually they get action before the end of the fourth week.

In most establishments the scripts are read as rapidly as they come in, the reader laying aside those which seem to possess merit and returning the others. Those retained are read by the editor when his duties permit him and if he likes the story it is usual to "put it up to" the director who is to make it, because of a theory that a director cannot make a good production unless he likes the scenario. All of this takes time and once the author is assured that the script has been received the delay is favorable.

REVIEWS OF BOOKS.

"Le Cinematographe."—This is a practical handbook, covering every branch of cinematography. The author, who writes in French, is Jacques Ducom. The book contains 330 pages and 124 illustrations. It is sold for 6 francs ($1.20). The work is based on the actual experiments and experiences of the author. He knows the industry from every point of view, theoretically and practically, and treats every subject in plain language. His review of the history of the invention is exhaustive and of interest not only to the moving picture man, but to the public generally as well. For French readers the book is of great value. The publisher is L. Geisler, 1 Rue de Medicis, Paris.

C. J. Strahan, principal of the Oakhurst, N. J., school, is negotiating for the purchase of a moving picture machine for use in the school nights for the instruction of the pupils.

Box parties in the dining-room window will soon be ausgespielt. Certain fairweather friends will also be missing.

Projection Department

Edited by F. H. RICHARDSON.

Motor Generator Set.—The Western Electric Co. writes: "I wish to give a few facts relative to our motor generator set for use on moving picture machines. Our sets are made in different capacities and voltages. The set Mr. Cundy, of Leadville, Col., a correspondent of your department, is using is 50-volt, 25-ampere, direct current generator, direct connected to a 220-volt single phase motor. By the use of this set, Mr. Cundy is able to obtain the proper arc voltage, relying solely upon his rheostat regulation on the fields of his generator. At the normal output of this machine, that is, 25 amperes, 50 volts, with the use of proper carbons, 6500 candlepower is normally obtained. By increasing the ampere output to 30 amperes, the candlepower is raised to 8500. At 6500 candlepower the current consumption is 2 K. W. At 8500 candlepower the current consumption is 2½ K. W. per hour. This is on the direct current voltage. If you were to use 110-volt A. C. and cut down the voltage by the use of resistance to the proper arc voltage, the current consumption of 2½ K. W. would only give 1000 candlepower. The above are the results of extensive tests made in our factory on the use of motor-generator sets and mercury arc rectifiers for use in moving picture practice. In looking over the columns of the Moving Picture World, the writer is very much impressed with the fact that its mission seems to be that of education for the operators and wage-earners and, secondarily, for the public through the managers and operators of moving picture shows. This is a very commendable feature indeed, and inasmuch as the moving picture profession can be made an excellent educational agent, the Moving Picture World is to be complimented for its very able work in this line. We thank you for the opportunity of explaining our motor-generator set to your readers."

We are indebted to the correspondent for the information contained in the letter. Am I correct in understanding you to mean that the field regulation automatically regulates the voltage and amperage? Does the machine within itself, without resistance in series, through automatic increase and decrease of field intensity, maintain a steady, uniform amperage at the arc, regardless of variable arc resistance due to constantly changing arc length? I would suggest to the correspondent, also to other companies manufacturing like devices, that they make clear, through this department, exactly what their machines will do and exactly how they do it. If by such a device an absolutely steady arc can be maintained without rheostatic resistance, it will cut out an enormous waste, but the curtain results must be had in brilliant, steady illumination, also to have any wide use the machine must be such as can be handled by operators not expert to any large degree in either electrics or mechanics. Moreover, the machines must not be prohibitive in cost. If this is a genuine possibility, it follows that at one operation the current could be transformed from A. C. to D. C. and at the same time resistance loss (more than 60 per cent. when working with 110 volts) be eliminated. The benefit would be large. In making these inquiries let it be understood that I am not questioning the statements of Norfolk or Leadville. We are not advertising any particular make of goods in this department and the invitation is extended to any or all who care to respond. What we most particularly want to settle is how close the amperage regulation is and how it is done. The above comments presume the motor-generators to operate efficiently—i.e., with low percentage of mechanical and electrical loss.

The Arc.—Athens, Ga., writes: "In your comment on my last letter you asked Dr. Gage, of Cornell University, to explain to us the action of the electric arc, and why it is luminous; also why the crater forms only on the positive carbon. I am awaiting his reply with much interest I have myself made an especial study of the electric arc during the past six or eight months and have received valuable information from the professor of physics and electrical engineer of the University of Georgia. If you had published all my last letter it would have shown that it was not so much the arc I was discussing as the fact that light propagates in a wave motion and not by straight lines. If I thought it would help our brother operators I would attempt an explanation myself through the Department, though I doubt if yourself or the operators would believe. For myself, I cannot help but believe. But let me say that this has not been thought out by me. I have gotten what knowledge I possess by hard study and competent instruction. Here are a few hints affording an avenue of study to those who may desire to follow the matter up. I want to recommend a book, 'The New Knowledge,' by B. K. Duncan. I don't know what the chemical action at the arc is. It is only the electrical that is of interest to us. You say the accepted theory is that the current travels from positive to negative. This is the accepted theory, but only for convenience in expression. In reality the current does no such thing. If there is any travel from one on through the other, it is the reverse. Better than this, however, it is a bombardment of electrical charges in motion. Mr. Edison practically told us this in his definition of a volt, in reply to your letter to him last year. The electronic theory teaches that negative electricity is made up of charges called corpuscles, or electrons. These corpusles have an enormous velocity of from 10,000 to 90,000 miles per second. They have a mass equal to one one-thousandth of a hydrogen atom. They discharge electrified bodies. They cause phosphorescence in bodies which they strike. They give rise to heat in bodies which they strike. They communicate mechanical motion to bodies which they strike. The electronic theory also teaches that static electricity is due to the action of these corpuscles at rest; that electric current is due to their action in motion, no matter what the conductor may be. That light and radiations are due to disturbances in the surrounding ether caused by a change in the motion of the corpuscles. All this is gleaned from the volume before named. In his book Mr. Duncan says: 'What positive electricity is, nobody knows. It has either no mass or very little. It seems to exist in particles the size of atoms. In fact, the size of the atoms seems to determine the size of the positive electricity with it. Positive electricty is never obtained free from atoms.' Positive particles carry positive, not negative electricity. Their velocity is much less than that of corpuscles. Their mass is a thousand times as great as that of a corpuscle. Now with these facts, for they are facts, cannot we reason why the positive carbon, or electrode, will waste away much faster than the negative? Were the arc in a perfect vacuum, the proportion would be 1,000 to 1 in favor of the positive. Also is it not easily reasoned why the energy expended would be transformed into heat at or near the surface of the positive; also why the positive would be depressed; and that with A. C. there would be no crater at all and that the light would not be divided between the two carbons as you claim, but would come probably from the white-hot ends of the carbons or from the arc stream itself? Also, that the light is not exactly proportional to the amperage, but more nearly proportional to the energy? For information of this sort, I refer to F. B. Crocker's 'Electric Lighting,' Vol. II. I trust this will interest you, even though you disagree. I shall continue my study of the arc and, if you so desire, will occasionally drop a line to the Department."

The matters you have set forth are highly theoretical, Athens, and at the end do not, it seems to me, agree with fact. There is a crater, though comparatively small, on both A. C. carbons. The illumination is proportional, or very nearly so, to the amperage, not the energy. Witness the series arc system where voltage mounts to thousands and amperage is ten. Moreover, the voltage at a projection arc is approximately 50 (D. C.), while the amperage has wide range. That part of your argument, it seems to me, does not hold water very well.

Generator Windings and Effect Thereof.—Leadville, Colo., writes: "I am enclosing a sketch in which you will notice I have numbered the main circuit (1) and the field circuit (2) and I am using this diagram for reference instead of the one printed (which I also enclose), as it is a little plainer.

Now, current is generated by a conductor cutting lines of magnetic force (or vice versa) and when the armature revolves the wires wound on it cut through the lines of force set up by the slight residual magnetism which is retained by the iron in the field poles. This sets up a current in the armature which is carried to the commutator in the armature brushes and out to circuit No. 1 (which is the main circuit).

"A certain part of this current is deflected through the shunt connection (2) to the field rheostat (regulating the amount of this flow) and back into the field winding, which in turn builds up the fields, causing the production of more lines of force, thus increasing the current in the armature, and this continues until the machine is up to speed.

"Now, follow the 'juice' from the brush when the arc is burning. It leaves the positive brush and goes through the main circuit. If there is very little resistance on the circuit, practically all the current will go through this circuit instead of forcing its way through the field rheostat, and thus cut down the field, and so in turn reduces the main current; but if the resistance on the main circuit is high, it forces the 'juice' through the field rheostat and builds up the field and increases the flow on the main circuit. Of course, in the foregoing, by 'flow' I mean amperage.

"Now, I do not say that this theory is correct; it is simply the idea I have, and I am anxious for corrections from anyone who really knows if I am in error.

"I notice 'Galveston, Tex.,' is in print with a little explanation of our difficulty, and I think he is right as far as he goes, but the main thing we are trying to find out concerns amperage or current and not voltage or E. M. F.

"My contention in the main is that on a small generator the arc resistance is enough to control the light in itself without any additions.

"I have no data at hand, but I think that you will find the resistance of an ordinary arc using ⅝ carbons is considerable, which fact is proved by the intense heat generated. I remember conducting a little experiment once (without the knowledge of the light company). I had a 250-ampere ammeter and hooked two No. 2 wires to their street car mains with a water rheostat. I fixed two ⅝ carbons ⅛ of an inch apart and struck an arc with an old file (Oh! you pre-Edison lamp days!). I had the ammeter in the circuit and by means of the rheostat gradually increased the current. The ammeter indicated right along up to 85 amperes and then, although I cut a lot more resistance out, it refused to move, and I think I must have had practically all resistance out, but still the carbons would only take the 85 amperes, with an unlimited supply on the line. Possibly that will account for something, and that was on a 550-volt circuit, so that on a 50-volt circuit they would take quite a little less.

"I hope a real E. E. will be interested enough to take this up and enlighten my understanding."

First of all, Leadville, I want to compliment you on your frank admission that you may possibly be wrong. It is a rare virtue among men, the general idea being to become insulted if one even intimates possibility of such a thing. An arc generates resistance according to its length and the amount of current flowing. With the ordinary D. C. projection arc we calculate this resistance as equal to a 45-volt drop; i.e., it requires a consumption of energy equal to 45 volts to force the current across the arc. With A. C. the arc is shorter and we find that about 35 volts only are consumed in overcoming the resistance of the air space. Using the well-known formula, we find the resistance of a 30-ampere arc to be (figuring 45-volt drop) 1½ ohms. Now, if we increase the amperage to 60, using the same formula, we find we have only 45/60 of an ohm resistance in the arc, while if we reduce the amperage to 20, we have more than 2 ohms, assuming the voltage drop and arc length to remain the same. If this theory is in error, let some one point it out. If it is correct, then it follows that, with the ordinary dynamo, running an arc without resistance would be an electrical impossibility, for the reason that to do so it would be necessary to maintain the amperage absolutely without change. The instant it increased a trifle the resistance would decrease and this would operate to instantly increase the amperage still more, again decreasing the resistance until there would be, to all intents and purposes, a short circuit pulling all the wires would carry or the dynamo produce. Vice versa, if the amperage started to decrease, the opposite condition would obtain and the resistance mount until the arc broke. That is what I meant when I said a projection arc could not be hitched to an ordinary dynamo—to the street mains, if you please, without resistance in series other than that of the arc itself.

According to my understanding of your letter and sketch, when the arc resistance increases, thus tending to reduce amperage, there is more current forced through the field rheostat, strengthening the field and forcing amperage through the increased arc resistance until the normal is again reached; also that the reverse takes place when the amperage rises above normal, thus reducing the arc resistance. Accepting this as fact (readers must remember that the electrical processes described at length actually take place practically instantaneously), can one dynamo be used for more than one amperage? In other words, can the field rheostat be set for different amperages?

Amplifying, for the benefit of those not versed in generation of current, let me say that the current is generated, as Leadville has said, by wires cutting what are called lines of force. An electrical conductor moved in a magnetic field will generate a current which will move at right angles to the line of motion. In a generator are what are called poles. These are merely chunks of soft iron about some portion of which are wound wires. These wires (insulated) are connected with the brushes and form what is called a "shunt" circuit (by-path). These poles are nothing more or less than magnets and the more current passes over the field wires the more heavily will the magnets be charged. Now, from the north pole of the magnet so formed, to the south pole, magnetism is constantly passing in what is called "lines of force." The stronger the magnets are the more of these lines of force there will be per square inch of magnet surface, and the more lines the more current per wire on the armature, hence on the circuit. The wires of the armature in revolving cut these lines of force at approximately right angles, and in so doing generate current which flows out over the lines of the circuit and is used in light and power. Crudely and very briefly, this is the operation of a generator (dynamo). Now suppose you have a generator capable of producing 100 amperes at 110 volts and a wire capable of carrying it, and that those wires are hitched to an arc lamp. The amperage is equal to the voltage divided by the resistance in ohms; hence, taking the arc resistance at 1½ ohms, we should immediately get abut 73 amperes. As a matter of fact, however, we would have in effect a short circuit. In fact, we would actually have one when we struck the arc. Now, if the field rheostat will operate to prevent this and maintain an approximately steady amperage, well and good. The saving would be enormous in the elimination of other resistance. That is why I am giving so much space to this discussion. If the time has come when we can kick the rheostat out the door and still get just as excellent results, we shall be saving more than half the projection current expense. With 220 volts we will be saving enormously. Using 110 volts through a rheostat we waste more than half the energy registered on the meter. With 220 volts we use about 50 volts and waste the rest. That is why I consider this as one of the most important discussions that have taken place in this department since its inception. Leadville, Norfolk and Galveston have our thanks for their contributions. Don't be afraid of treading on the editor's toes. We want the truth and the straight of this matter. In re-drawing the sketch I added the "2" which is below the fixed magnets, as this, as I understand it, is a necessary part of the shunt circuit.

Lenses and Generator Sizes.—Portland, Ore., writes: "(1) What size projection lens is right for a 12x14-foot picture at 74 feet? (2) What size lens would you advise for dissolver? (3) What size (K. W.) generator would be required to handle an Edison Exhibition machine, a double dissolver, and 125 sixteen C. P., 110-volt lamps? I hope I am not asking too much and that I shall receive reply in next issue."

Those who wish prompt replies should ask questions in ample time, as on long distance matter there is delay all around. If immediate reply is imperative, enclose one dollar and reply will be made by mail. All queries are replied to in the earliest possible issue. Next, allow me to correct not only you but about everyone else. I know of no such thing as a "double" dissolver. Every dissolver is "double" so far as lenses, lamphouse, etc., are concerned. The proper term, therefore, is simply "dissolver." About everyone connected with the business commits this error. Replying to your queries: (1) By size I take it you mean focal length. If you mean diameter, I would use an ordinary projection lens. If you mean focal length, you will have to figure that out for yourself to get accurate results, since the variation of as much as 1/64 of an inch in width (we don't take the height into account in figuring) of aperture would mean a lot on the screen. If you have a handbook, see page 68. If not, then measure the exact width of your aperture with an inside caliper. Multiply the throw in feet by the exact width of aperture in the fraction of an inch and divide the result by the desired width of picture, in feet. Supposing your aperture to be exactly 15/16 of an inch wide. The problem would be 74x15/16 divided by 14. The result would be the equivalent focus of lens required. This is as close as you can come to it with the cheap, inaccurate projection lenses. (2) I would by all means get half-size projection lenses. Their E. F. may be found in the same manner except that we use 3 as the width of aperture, thus 74x3 divided by 14. (3) Your question is too ambiguous. You may use anywhere from 25 to 45 amperes of current on the projection lamp (I assume it is D. C.) and from 15 to 25 amperes on each dissolver lamp. Your 16 C. P. lamps will require approximately 65 watts to the lamp, or a total of about 8,000 watts. Decide what amperage you propose to use on the various lamps, then add the entire amperage of all lamps together, allowing ½ ampere to each incandescent globe, and multiply by 110. This will give you the total wattage. Divide this by 1,000 and you have the K. W. You should allow a liberal margin over this. It never pays to work a generator up to capacity. Supposing you propose using 15 amperes on each dissolver lamp and 30 on the machine. This would mean, including the incandescents, 125 amperes, which multiplied by 110 shows 13,750 watts, or nearly 14 K. W. However, this may be greatly modified if you do not run the machine lamp or dissolver at the same time, and probably only a portion of the incandescents when the arc is burning. A 30-ampere, 110-volt arc consumes 3.3 K. W. Half of your incandescents would use up about an equal amount, so that if you only burned that much at one time you could get along nicely with a seven or eight K. W. generator. However, so many equations enter into the matter that I can give you no definite answer. I have shown you how to figure it though, and no doubt you can do the rest. Mind you, though, these figures only hold good for the arc when using rheostatic resistance. If I were you I would investigate the generator similar to the one used by Norfolk, Va., or Leadville, Colo. You will probably save money by doing it.

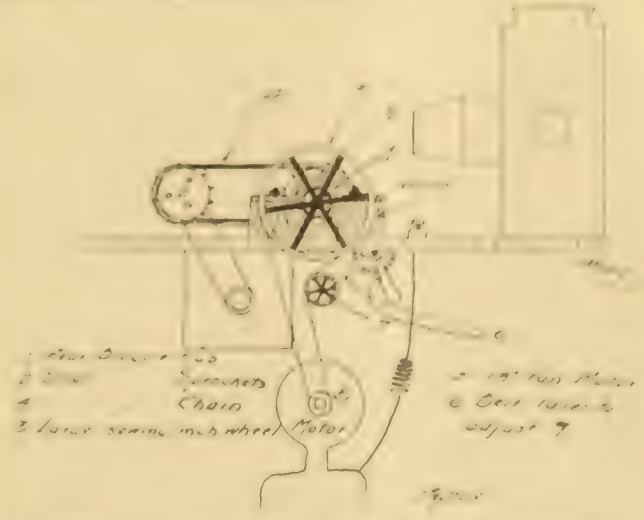
Attaching Motor.—Mr. J. Roy Hunt, manager and owner of the Belle Theater, Gadsden, Ala., writes: "Noted requests recently for method of attaching motor to drive machine. Am enclosing sketch showing my way of doing it. Rightly done, it works perfectly. Have used this method for six years, therefore can say I have given it a fair trial. Its great feature is that with it you may govern machine speed absolutely and may stop the machine entirely without stopping motor. Anyone who has used a direct motor drive knows that when the film jumps, the momentum of the motor makes it difficult to stop the machine quickly. The attachment is perfectly simple and, what is more, does not cost much to make. Get two small sprockets from old bicycles. Pick out a good rear bicycle hub, one in which the ball-bearings are in good condition. If you can get a coaster brake hub, so much the better. Get an old sewing machine belt wheel and, aside from the chain, your material is complete. Have some machinist attach the belt wheel to one end of the hub shaft, and one of the sprockets to the other end. Get a block of wood and cut a recess in one side of it to fit the hub. By means of a metal cap or bar, bolt the hub securely to the block, resting in the recess. Bolt the block securely to the machine table board in position shown. The other sprocket is attached to the end of the takeup belt pulley with three screws. Connect the two sprockets with a bicycle chain, being sure to have chain long enough to allow for framing of carriage. If takeup pulley does not move with carriage, grooved pulleys and round belt may be used instead of chain and sprockets. Under the machine table fix a lever, with a quadrant having notches, carrying an idler as shown. The motor may be any kind of one-speed type. Put on a spool for a temporary pulley and lag it up with tape (having idler set up tight) until machine runs at highest speed you use. Then get a pulley made that size for the motor, with wide flanges so belt cannot jump off when it is slack. Be sure to have idler wheel good and wide so it will always be sure to catch the belt. I hope you can understand all this. The description is complicated, but the device is really quite simple."



I believe, Friend Hunt, the description, together with the sketch, both of which are excellent, will enable anyone to build the device. It looks very practical and very good to me. One thing, however, I will mention. I should say it would be necessary to have the block of wood extend over the table in order to bring the sprockets in line with each other, unless both sprocket and belt wheel be placed on same side of hub. As you have it, I don't think the block could be more than an inch wide, and how you could use a bicycle hub, which is about 4 inches long, I don't quite see, unless you put an extension on the table board. The extension would, however, be an easy matter, and really the device impresses me as the best motor connection I have seen to date. Many thanks for submitting it.

Machine Trouble.—Oakland, Calif., writes: "Have a Pathe and a Motiograph, 1908 Model. Pictures projected by the Pathe are all right, but on the Motiograph they are very unsteady. There is a side movement and occasionally they jump up and down. Can you suggest remedy? Being new at the business, I do not know the names of all the machine parts. Where can I get a catalogue showing them?"

I will request the makers of the machine to send you a catalogue of parts. The movement is not the fault of the machine. It is due to the fact that it is out of adjustment or else badly worn. On pages 120-21-22-23 and 24 of your handbook you will find detailed instruction on the Motiograph mechanism. The jump may be due to worn intermittent sprocket teeth, or to lost motion between star and cam. It may also be due to the tension springs not exerting sufficient pressure on the film. As it only occurs "once in a while," I presume the trouble lies in the springs. They are too loose and allow the film to overshoot a little whenever a bad patch goes through. Examine them. If worn quite thin, get a new pair. If not, then place a small round rod or screwdriver blade under them and pull outward while running the rod up and down under the spring. Thus you will bow them out and get more pressure. If there is much lost motion in the intermittent sprocket, take it out as per instructions in handbook. If intermittent sprocket teeth are much worn, get a new one. Side motion may be due to (a) tension springs loose and working from side to side. Tighten screws holding them; (b) top gate idler having lots of side motion. Take side motion out. (c) Intermittent sprocket having side motion. I have not a 1908 model at hand, but on the 1909 model there is no adjustment possible to eliminate side motion in the intermittent sprocket. However, it is exceedingly unlikely that the Motiograph would ever develop much side motion in the intermittent sprocket. You may therefore look to "a" or "b" for the trouble. It is possible that your whole machine moves slightly every time the crank goes round. This gives rhythmic side motion on the screen. Remedy is to anchor the machine more firmly.

Law: Volt Drop.—Brooklyn, N. Y., writes: "This is the first time I have bothered you and I hope you will answer me. I have heard the six months' apprenticeship law has been declared unconstitutional by the courts. Has it? Does every operator have to undergo another examination? A brother operator says they do. I have had an argument. I claim the voltage drop across the arc is 45 with D. C. and 35 with A. C. B claims it is but 20 volts with D. C. Which is correct? He also says that with a 25-ampere, 110-volt rheostat we only have about 19 ampers at the arc. He says the rheostat has 4.4 ohms resistance, and taking off the drop of the arc would give 19 amperes. Is this correct?"

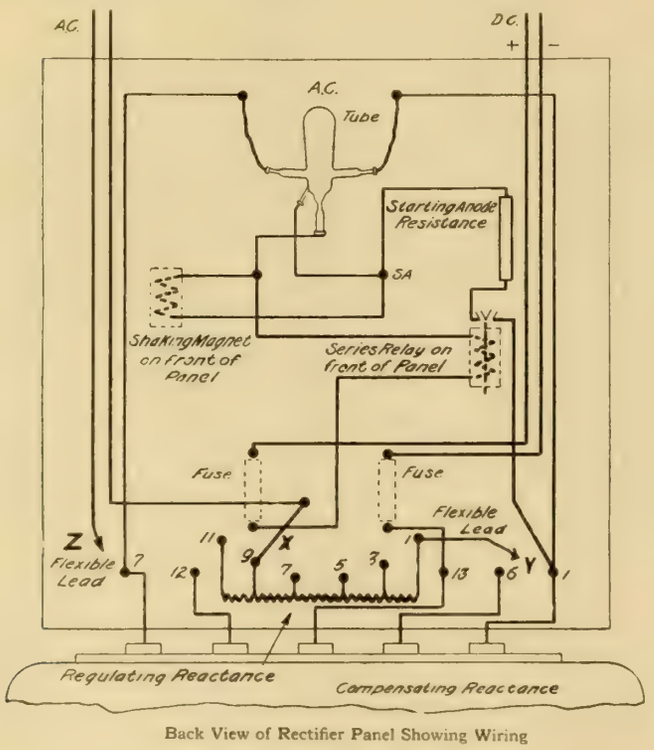
The voltage drop is not constant, depending largely on the length of the arc. It is approximately 35 volts for A. C. and between 45 and 50 for D. C. To find the amperage, subtract the arc drop from the line voltage and divide by the number of ohms in the rheostat. To find the ohms in a rheostat, subtract the arc drop from line voltage and divide by amperes flowing. With 25 amperes flowing, the total resistance is equal to 110 divided by 25 = 4⅖ ohms. The rheostatic resistance is (D. C.) 110 — 45 divided by 25, or 2⅖ ohms. With the ordinary 25-ampere rheostat we will only actually get from 18 to 20 amperes after it has been used for a time. This is by reason of the fact that the coils, under the influence of heat, develop greater resistance as they get older, thus raising the total resistance opposed to the voltage, or flow of current. When this stage is reached (18 to 20 ampers) there is little or no more raise in the resistance until the coils begin to give out entirely. We then have 110 — 45 divided by—say, 19—for the rheostatic resistance. It equals practically 3⅝ ohms. The formula on p. 9 of the handbook should have a "— 45" after the V for D. C., and a "— 35" after it for A. C. In other words, the numerator of the letter fraction should read V — 45 when dealing with D. C., and V — 35 when dealing with A. C. Handbook owners will please turns to page 9 and add this to the numerator of the letter fraction given under "Rule of Thumb." As to the law, the non-citizenship clause has been knocked out. The six months' apprenticeship part also is no more. An operator holding license may or may not be re-examined at the discretion of the Department.

Bunch of Queries.—Northfield, Vt., asks: "(1) What makes D. C. better for projection than A. C.? Have never worked with D. C. (2) What is the principle of the Mercury Arc Rectifier? (3) There is a rainbow across the screen diagonally from center of side to center of bottom. Can find no explanation for it. (4) Will you explain the tension equalizer of the Motiograph?"



Back View of Rectifier Panel Showing Wiring

D. C. is superior to A. C. by reason of the fact that the whole force of the current is expended in the formation of one crater on the top carbon, whereas with A. C. its force is divided between two craters—one on the top and one on the lower carbon. Naturally the D. C. crater is very much larger and a much larger percentage of the light is available. Later, when pressure on space is not so great I will explain more at length if you ask for it. The handbook explains all these matters, however. (2) To enter into a detailed explanation would consume more space than I can spare at this time. Briefly, the rectifier changes A. C. to D. C. by alternately taking current from each wire of the circuit. Using the two directions north and south for illustration: when the current is flowing north it enters the anoid on one side of the rectifier, but when it starts flowing south it cannot reverse its direction through the tube and is taken in from the other side instead, thus producing a pulsating current in one direction. Herewith you will see cut of rectifier wiring. (3) In all probability, it is due to wrong set of carbons or carrying too short an arc. (4) If you mean the takeup tension, it is very simple. By means of thumbscrews provided, the idler wheel may be raised or lowered. By this means tighten the belt by raising the idler, until the reel barely revolves and takes up the film when the reel is full.

Shutter Out.—Cape May, N. J., has trouble setting his Powers Six shutter. Also wants to know how to take up lost motion between cam and cross.

It is quite possible that you have one of the old style shutters, the blade of which was narrower than that now in use. If so, it would be well to ask the Powers Company to send you a new, late style shutter blade. Loosen one screw in outer shutter hub and loosen the other just so you can slip the shutter by holding flywheel stationary and exerting a little pressure on shutter blade. Revolve the flywheel backward until intermittent sprocket just begins to move (backward). Be sure to get it right where the sprocket just barely starts moving and then slip the shutter until the wide blade (one with stamp on) covers not quite half the upper half of the lens. Next put in a film and try it out, slipping the shutter little by little until there are no streaks up or down from letters in the titles. If streaks show both up and down at the same time the shutter blade is too narrow. When you get it right, tighten up the screws again. Assuming that you have the new style carriage, loosen set screw holding left hand intermittent bushing. In the edge of bushing you will see two small holes. Insert punch in one of them and lift up, thus turning the bushing in its bearing. Run the machine at the same time and be sure not to get it tight enough to bind. Better have it a little too slack than too tight. Be sure to tighten the setscrew again when done. If you have an old style carriage, there is no adjustment possible. If the bushing has the holes mentioned, it is a new style carriage.

Lost His Laurels.—New York City writes, saying he has, in the past, had a reputation for good projection, but has lately lost his laurels. He asks us to help him get them back. Aside from telling us what make of machine, resistance, length of throw and width of picture, he gives us no information. We must ask you to describe in just what way the present curtain effect is bad before we can offer help, New York.

Mercury Arc Rectifier.—Los Angeles, Calif., writes: "Have had experience with choke coils, rheostats, etc., but am up against a new one now, viz: the Mercury Arc Rectifier. I know something about this device, but not enough. Have discovered I still have something to learn, therefore ask your kind assistance. Have no trouble during time I am running the reels, but when I trim my carbons it requires from two to five minutes to get a good light again. What is the cause? Is it weak current? Kindly explain how to hook up a rectifier."

I am inclined to think you are not getting enough amperage. Of course, after installing new carbons you must not, as you doubtless know, expect good light until a crater has been burned on the new carbon. That, combined with weak amperage, would explain the matter fully.

By means of the diagram on this page you can easily trace out your wires and see if they are correctly connected. The wires marked A. C. go to the mains, of course, and the D. C. leads to the lamp. If you use 110-volt supply, connect lead Z to stud 12 and lead Y to stud 6. If the supply is 220 volts, connect lead Z to stud 7 and lead Y to stud 1. Do not disturb other connections that are made on studs 1, 6, 7 and 12, but place leads Z and Y as directed. The lead X controls the amperage within the limits of rectifier's capacity. When lead X is connected to stud 1 you are getting all the rectifier will deliver. If it is connected to stud 11 you get its minimum output, with varying amperage between (when connected to studs 9, 7, 5 or 3). The mess of wires back of the panel may be a little confusing at first, but if you carefully compare connections with this diagram you should be able to understand it after studying the thing carefully.

Notice.—Owing to tremendous pressure on space and the fact that several letters have already been held over, though already in type, we are obliged to shorten our matter this week; also to hold over several excellent letters. They will appear soon.

Comments on the Films

"The Making of a Man" (Biograph), October 5.—The knowledge of the fact that the village girl whom he had married was homeless and yet beyond his help, for he couldn't find her, did give the actor, hero of this picture, a dignity that was human and manly; but the picture is not well named, for the girl is the center of interest all through the film. In the early scenes, the man is shown as merely a barnstormer. The hard experience of the girl who fell in love with him, ran away and married him and was soon separated from him but, in abject poverty, found him in the end, grips our sympathies. The story is very well managed and at least two of the scenes are filled with significance—the silent picture can sometimes go where words cannot follow. The two great scenes are when the father brings the girl home after she has married the actor, and again when she finds her father dead in his chair. It is extremely well acted in most of its scenes. It is a strong, gripping, human picture. People will be glad to see it.

"Maud Muller" (Selig), October 5.—These pictures setting forth the story of the well known ballad are made more effective by a pale buff tint, giving an unreal, poetic atmosphere. The scenes are skillfully arranged and are for the most part full of merit, although the acting is somewhat stilted and unnatural. The entrance to the church in which the young judge married the rich bride was much too modern for a picture of Maud Muller's story. The picture is true enough and good enough to be more than merely acceptable, but to say that it is an adequate representation of Whittier's poem would hardly be true.

"The Stolen Gray" (Melies), October 5.—The gray that was stolen was a horse, and the man who took him was a rustler and he sold him to Walsh, the father of the heroine, Doris. By means of this horse the thieves manage to bring Walsh under suspicion. Walsh chases the thieves, and the boys chase Walsh. He is caught and about to be hanged, but is saved by Doris. The picture is almost wholly conventional. There is nothing of moment or special interest in it that has not been shown before and shown better. Some of the photographs are good, some are slightly out of focus and give an impressionistic effect to the pictures of hills and trees.

"The Missing Bracelet" (Gaumont), October 3.—Jimmie was the Countess's footman. They thought he stole the bracelet, but he didn't. It was left in the motor car and the chauffeur found it. It was the lady detective who suspected Jimmie. He is exonerated in the end, through the chauffeur's simplicity. It is good, particularly the last two scenes. The audience liked it. But Jimmie has been the making of better pictures than this.

"Master Cupid, Detective" (Essanay), October 5.—The detective was the employer's daughter. She seemed to like the junior clerk and she saw that the senior clerk was trying to get the younger man convicted of the thefts of money that were taking place in the office. Of course, the spectators are in the secret. It was very improbable, her father's failing to recognize his daughter in spite of wig and make-up. However, it is a cleverly managed picture of a detective story and amply fulfills its requirements as such. In other words, the impression that is early created is maintained with a good measure of effect to the bringing home of the guilt. It is a very well acted and acceptable picture.

"The Squaw's Mistaken Love" (Pathe), October 5.—The young squaw mistook the captive for a man and made love to her. The girl's father wanted her to stay at home while he, with the girl's lover and others, made a trip over the mountains in a search for gold. The girl, dressed as a man, followed, and they didn't send her back. Later she and her lover are separated from the rest of the party and are captured by Indians. The squaw frees them and runs away with them and has a rude awakening. Surely this is a new incident in Western pictures. As for the rest of the picture, it is made up largely of such happenings as have become stock properties of such pictures, the chase for instance. These are, however, handled with much skill. The acting is good, the photographs clear and the scenes interesting.

"His Exoneration" (Lubin), October 5.—Here is a film which tells the story of a man accepting the blame for a large shortage and disappearing while the guilty one lives on unknown. Later the assumption of guilt arises to prevent the young man marrying the girl of his choice. However, the real guilty one, the young man's stepfather, is informed of the situation and takes the blame upon himself. There is an exciting rush to the church which is reached just in time to prevent the girl saying the word. Explanations follow and the young man takes the place of the expectant groom. It is a good story and much interest is aroused when they are trying to straighten out the difficulty the young man is in. But it is not as good as many pictures Lubin releases.

"How Mrs. Murray Saved the American Army" (Edison), October 10.— A picture in the series of Revolutionary incidents that the Edison company is undertaking. It's a story of the retreat from New York. The American army had just passed Mrs. Murray's house when the British army arrives. She invites the officers in and entertains them. Meanwhile a young American officer, a friend of Mrs. Murray's daughter, comes back to the house and is told of the situation. He dresses up as a servant and brings in the tray of wine to the British officers and cleverly manages to get the map that they have made. They suspect him and he has to fight his way out. He carries the map safely to General Putnam of the American forces. The picture is well acted and very good entertainment, as well as being an instructive, educational picture.

"Town Hall To-Night" (Essanay), October 7.—They were two poor comedians and they had a hard time. One got put in jail and the other had to stay around, because it took two to carry the trunk along the railroad ties. The free one dressed up as the other man's poor, old mother, whose sad tale made the sheriff cry. He freed the poor boy and their plight and sad story soon got the whole town bawling and making contributions. It is a laughter-making picture.

"The Upward Way" (Gaumont), October 7.—This film may fairly be called a biography. It presents some of the most important episodes in the life of Giovanna Battista Lully, a Florentine violinist, born in 1633 and died in 1687. He did much to improve orchestra music and write a number of operas, which have remained popular till now. The settings for the picture are interpretative of scenes in his life and illustrate the life and customs of the time.

"Cintra, a Picturesque Town of Portugal" (Gaumont), October 7.—An excellent outdoor film giving clear and artistic illustrations of this old Portugese town. It is situated at the foot of a rocky mountain and has been the residence of the court at different times. The scenes are all apparently characteristic and afford a good impression of the town and its natural beauties.

"The Sheriff's Decision" (Essanay), October 6.—A good story well told. The sheriff did his duty even though the girl plead with him to release her lover. The chance meeting by the roadside, the second meeting after an interval of ten years and the elopement which ended with the arrest of the young man for murder all are interesting episodes which add to the value of the story. The background and the setting are alike in harmony with the subject, and the decision of the sheriff to enforce the law at the close, ends in the right way what is an otherwise good film.

"The California Revolution of 1846" (Kalem), October 6.—A love story with a historical attachment. It deals with the proclamation of thirteen American settlers in California in 1846 who seized the pueblo of Sonoma, raised the bear flag and declared California a republic. The love story involves the Spanish gentleman who was in command of the pueblo at the time and a love affair between the senorita he wished to marry and a dashing young American who finally secured the girl, even at the very altar. The story has a dash and swing to it which are admirable and carry the audience forward as though they were looking upon the actual scenes. The scenery is excellent and the photography brings out the best qualities of it.

"Carr's Regeneration" (Vitagraph), October 6.—Carr has a most unhappy disposition; he is a very ugly tempered man and when he is given a job as caretaker of a children's playground, it seems as though, with all the possibilities, that something very painful in its effects to Carr is sure to happen. What happens does not come in just the way expected, but it is brought about by Carr's character and is part of his proper fate. Through his negligence, one of the children, a cripple, the only one whom Carr cares for, is hurt. Carr, at first, thinks she is killed. He is made human by it. Ralph Ince plays Carr very effectively and is supported by a very competent cast. It's a good picture.

"The Mistress of the Hacienda" (Kalem), October 9.—A story of the Hacienda del Cerro in 1852, and the scene is at the boundary between Lower and Southern California. It is shown that the mistress is loved by an Apache chief. An American and his sick wife take refuge in the hacienda and the girl becomes fascinated by the American, who rejects her advances, and her passionate Southern blood desires revenge. She plans to have the Indian chief carry off the American's wife. The chief abducts herself instead. He is discovered; there's a fight under her window and a chase with a rescue, but the Indian has stabbed the girl and she dies. It is extremely well acted and staged. It is effective and will make a good and desirable number.

"Italian Blood" (Biograph), October 9.—One doesn't need to be told that the workman's wife in this picture is Italian, or at least of Southern blood; nor that her husband is Irish, that is, not while he remembers that he is Irish. The man loves her, but because he doesn't show it as an Italian would, she feels that he is cold. An Irishman likes to light his own pipe, while an Italian likes to have his wife hold the match. The wife tries to waken her husband's love through jealousy, and very nearly brings about a tragedy. The man overhears a conversation just in time and understands. The picture gets a pretty firm grip on a very human situation, and is fairly well designed. It is a picture worth while seeing. If the acting is not equally careful in all the scenes, in the best scenes it is fine.

"Leaves of a Romance" (Edison), October 7.—The romance of a society girl visiting the West, and of a cowboy who was of some assistance to her on one or two occasions and with whom she fell in love. The girl's father seems to have had a friend whom he wanted her to marry, but who was neither desired nor desirable. The cowboy and the girl elope and are married. The scenes are shaped as though seen through leaves, different, or at least changed, for each scene. It is a pretty conceit, but it doesn't add to the effectiveness of the conventional story to any great extent. The acting is good; the film, commendable.

"An Indian Vestal" (Selig), October 9.—A white girl is shown as stolen by Indians. She grows up unconscious of her origin and is regarded as a goddess. Later she meets a white trapper who tells her that she is also white. The tribe refuses to release her and is about to burn the trapper. The girl uses her power and persuades the tribe to let her marry the trapper, who later persuades her to return to civilization. It is commendable as a pleasing, poetic picture. Mr. Bostworth plays the trapper, while the vestal's part is taken by a very personable young lady. The backgrounds have hardly been equaled in any former picture; some of the natural scenery being grand, even tremendous.

"For Massa's Sake" (Pathe), October 7.—The darkey players in this picture, with the exception of Uncle Joe, were not equal to its situation, and it passes without adequate effect upon the emotions. Old Uncle Joe, manumitted slave, sells himself and his family again into slavery to pay the gambling debts of his old master's son. Nothing else in the picture is equal to this glorious action. Of course, the young man finds a gold mine and, once more rich, seeks out his old friend and one-time servant. It is a touching scene. He comes out on the cotton field and finds Uncle Joe being beaten by a harsh taskmaster whom he straightway knocks down. The audience applauded the picture, and liked it greatly.

"Rejected" (Gaumont), October 7.—A very interesting old world atmosphere gives character to this pastoral picture. The story tells how a simple peasant met and fell in love with a great actress who was spending a vacation at her parent's home in the country. The poor boy seems almost to go crazy when he is rejected. The scenes are very pretty. The picture gives no deep impression; it is not sad. The mind is more likely to enjoy it as a piece of clever artistry.

"Pansies" (Gaumont), October 7.—The qualities of Gaumont flower pictures are well known. This, on the same reel with "Rejected," is acceptable. It is not of great value.

"The Little Animal Trainer" (Pathe), October 9.—It begins with one of those tragedies of circus life—the death of an animal trainer at the teeth of his trained leopard. The picture didn't need the actual death scene and wasn't made more beautiful by it. The trainer's family is left destitute till the boy takes his father's place and goes into the cages of several fierce animals. He uses a whip. One woman back in the audience expressed great disapproval of the exhibition.

"Betty's Boat" (Pathe), October 9.—Betty had a toy boat and while her parents were out made a little ocean of the kitchen to float it. What happened as a consequence was certainly remarkable. The French rough-house farces have nothing on work like this.

"Marvelous Transformations" (Pathe), October 9.—A very well arranged trick film. The reviewer has seen nothing at all like this in any other picture. Its interest comes from the accurate substitution of many players, each developing into the other.

"Daddy's Boy and Mammy" (Vitagraph), October 9.—A Civil Wartime picture in which daddy's boy cleverly manages to get a Federal uniform for his father, who is hiding in the old Southern homestead. The father, wearing it, gets through the Union lines and escapes. The plot is slight, but the characters, especially mammy, are very interesting. The picture of an oldtime kitchen is worth seeing. The story is also full of good comedy, and the audience very plainly enjoyed it. It is very commendable.

"What Will Be, Will Be" (Lubin), October 9.—A comedy that in outline is quite conventional. A widower and a widow, with a son and a daughter, respectively, live in houses with adjoining grounds. The young people are sweethearts, but the widow decides to build a hencoop where it will be unpleasantly close to the widower's lawn. This causes a quarrel between the older people and looks as though it was going to end the love match. The only fresh part of the picture is that showing how the young people broke through the difficulty. There seems to be not much "go" in the picture and through parts it drags. The audience looked at it in silence.

"Reparation" (Essanay), October 10.—It happened at the Kanakee District Fair. While the Grahams are looking at the prize cattle and new agricultural machines, Warren, the picture's hero, is losing all his cash to a three card monte man. When his money is gone he risks a locket that his sweetheart, Miss Graham, had given him. He thinks he has been cheated and makes a disturbance for which he is arrested. The Grahams, simple farmer folk, drive sadly home alone. Warren, disgraced, later gets work in the city and his engagement with Miss Graham is broken off. The reparation is made by the sharper, because he fell in love with Miss Graham and discovered that she still loved Warren. The picture is well designed and naturally acted. It may not wholly convince the cynical, but it's pretty effective.

"Our Navy" (Vitagraph), October 3.—In this full reel, the Vitagraph Company has given the public an excellent reproduction of some of the most interesting phases of a sailor's life. Indeed, it would be a dense person who could not obtain a reasonably good impression of the life of the average Jacky from looking at this film. All the most interesting and characteristic features of the sailor's life are portrayed. The film will be very popular, since it conveys such an accurate and easily understood idea of the life on board a United States ship.

Synopses of this Week's productions in this paper
INDISPUTABLE ORIGINATORS OF COWBOY FILMS.
WE CONTINUE TO OFFER EACH WEEK MR. G. M. ANDERSON, (POPULARLY KNOWN AS "BRONCHO BILLY") IN THRILLING STORIES OF EARLY DAYS IN WESTERN AMERICA, STAGED UNDER THE PERSONAL SUPERVISION OF MR. ANDERSON, ASSISTED BY A CAREFULLY TRAINED COMPANY

"The Artist's Sons" (Selig), October 6.—The chief interest of this picture lies in the fact that it was produced under the personal direction of an artist, who wrote the scenario and supervised its production. The artist's own sons take a prominent part and there are scenes in the artist's studio, his home and elsewhere which are so closely personal that they could not be produced under any other circumstances. It is a sweet home story the picture tells, and the leading characters are lovable, even on the screen. What will increase the interest the film introduces the audience to that little understood but always attractive place, the Bohemia which artists are supposed to inhabit. The film deserves commendation and will excite unusual interest wherever it is shown. The subject and the setting are both so unusual that their popularity is assured.

"Foul Play" (Edison), October 6.—Charles Reade's famous story is acceptably visualized in this film. The story is well told, or so much of it as is essential to an understanding of the narrative and it is told so well that those who have read the novel will be delighted with the rendition, while those who have not read it will be given an opportunity to become acquainted with a worth while tale. The shipwreck and the life on the island will attract by their realistic character. The closing scene where Arthur Wardlaw is confronted with the evidence of his double villainy has a strong appeal to the dramatic instinct. The actors have interpreted the author's work with appreciation and sympathy, while the costuming and the staging are the work of a master. Indeed, the film is well worth all the encomiums which some in the audience bestowed upon it as it was running.

"Told in Colorado" (Selig), October 10.—A story of love and needless jealousy, told in backgrounds of beautiful mountains and woodlands, and with some rough comedy that lightens a story that is filled with tragic possibilities. The rougher part of the audience laughed at a very lively hair pulling match between the engineer's sweetheart and Miss Edythe, a visitor to the mountains. Edythe's lover is thrown over a cliff by the jealous engineer. He falls many feet, but by a miracle is not killed and lives to frighten the engineer, who thinks he sees a ghost. It is not a vital or human picture; but it isn't slow.

"Pathe Weekly," October 10.—Among other things, it shows how we are making progress in getting to the "Maine," U. S. ship sunk in Havana; also a bull fight and a lively one; the Russian Czar reviewing the student battalion; and in Constantinople the procession bearing the Sultan's gifts to Mecca. It is a good number.

"The Missing Will" (Vitagraph), October 10.—The young man was a struggling attorney who had long expected to inherit from his uncle, when the uncle suddenly got married for the second time. The uncle, however, shows him that he has been left something. The new wife overhears; she cannot bring herself to destroy the will, but she hides it. The uncle drops dead and the will can't be found. The nephew, in financial straits, has to let his stenographer go, for he cannot pay her. The widow, passing in an automobile, attempts to dispose of the will by tearing it in small pieces, which she scatters along the road just as the stenographer is passing. Enough pieces are picked up to show what the papers are and then others are found, and the document is complete. The girl brings it to the man and later they are married by the Rev. John Bunny. The widow's discomfiture, like the whole picture, is finely acted. A very good film.

"Mr. Bragg a Fugitive" (Biograph), October 2.—He thought he was a strong-armed man and, in his gymnasium, was courageous, far more so than he was outside. When he plucked up courage to fight the flirtatious butcher, that man seemed to cave in. What is more, Bragg got real blood on his hands; it was beef blood, but it scared him. It isn't so funny as the other on this reel, but it's good.

"Flirts" (Pathe), October 6.—This picture is a leaf taken out of the book of life. Two girls meet two fellows and there are the same vows of undying affection exchanged that have passed current through all the ages and they were broken just as quickly after the party are separated. They meet again, all with reproaches on their lips, but when they realize that all have indulged in the same diversion, reconciliation follows. The film is a reproduction of things that occur every day in the year and therefore ought to be popular.

"Trained Dogs" (Pathe), October 6.—A novelty picture in which a number of dogs perform interesting feats. The film is a novelty which is well worth seeing. Besides, it is somewhat out of the ordinary. The work of the dogs is far better than some which are shown in the vaudeville in some theaters.

"The Slavey's Affinity" (Lubin), October 12.—The [illegible] of the little household drudge who loved a young lawyer is pathetic. Yet it has elements of strength. Her masterly handling of the jealous sweetheart deserves commendation. The forlorn girl standing outside the room while the lovers are becoming reconciled arouses the sympathy of the audience. It is a good story well told.

"For the Flag" (Kalem), October 11.—A good story is told in this film and a brave little girl is given an opportunity to display her patriotism. There is a capture of a French fort by English soldiers, its recapture by the French and Indians, a near execution by the Indians, prevented only by the locket which the young Frenchman wears, given him by the girl who befriended an Indian. The girl's resentfulness toward the English, and her grabbing up of the French flag and running with it as it falls, are realistic, while her lover's daring escape is a good bit of work. The background is interesting and is helpful in interpreting the story. It will be popular. The bravery and intense action are certain to please.

"Mae's Suitors" (Edison), October 11.—A breezy comedy. It tells the story of the numerous suitors of an heiress and the purchase of a yacht to get rid of them, only to find that the sailors are the troublesome suitors in disguise. The ending is good. The only man who couldn't swim and therefore could have part in saving the girl from drowning gets her after all, and even the disappointed suitors are happy.

"The Indian Flute" (Vitagraph), October 11.—The capable actors have presented a drama of unusual power in this film. The sympathy of the audience goes out to the Indian who loves the maid, whose love in turn is given to another. His method of suicide, drifting over the falls in a canoe, is sensational, but is well managed and seems to convince. The contrast with the man and woman in the other canoe is marked and increases the sympathy felt for him. Perhaps many in the audience console themselves with the philosophic reflection that this is an accurate illustration of life.

"One on the Masher" (Pathe), October 11.—The old masher who was forced to drink poison by the irate husband furnishes a good deal of sport before the film ends. He gets his pay for his presumption and there is no sympathy expressed. They all think his conduct deserving of a vigorous application of red pepper or anything else the husband chose to give him.

"Pardoned by the Governor" (Eclipse), October 11.—A brigand allows the governor and his daughter to go. Later the governor pardons the brigand, thus settling all accounts, moral or otherwise.

"Making Cheddar Cheese" (Eclipse), October 11.—An interesting industrial film showing all the processes of manufacture from milking the cows to the finished cheese. The milking scene is very bucolic and has an appropriate setting. It is an excellent film.

Independent

"Mutt and Jeff Spend a Quiet Day" (Nestor), October 7.—Mutt and Jeff go fishin'. Some escaped convicts take their clothes and make them dress up in prison suits. The guards make them take the suits off and Mutt goes home in a barrel. Jeff swipes a nightgown. It's funny.

"Foolshead a Model Guest" (Itala), October 7.—A man like Foolshead is himself a situation. There is more to this picture than has been in many films of this series. It is funny even to the hardened reviewer. It will be acceptable to most audiences.

"The Human Sacrifice" (Reliance), October 11.—Egyptian scenes give background to this big picture. There is much in it that suggests that it was taken in some city near the Nile. It has many persons in the cast, and large crowds stand behind and about the central actions. An Egyptian brother and sister, Rameses and Amen, are pictured as being in flower of life at the time that the Nile refused to overflow its banks and irrigate the land. Offerings of living things—bullocks, goats, sheep, flowers—are made to the gods, but in vain. Amebi sends her pet doves. Isis, the goddess, claims a human sacrifice, a virgin. In the temple, Amebi stands with the other virgins and is chosen. A little later, Rameses attempts to rescue her; he almost succeeds, but after a short but very well conducted chase through the courts of the great temple, she is retaken and Rameses is cast out. The girl, covered with a veil and crowned with flowers, is led through the crowded streets to the Nile and cast into the water, where she dies. The final scene (not very effective) shows her borne away on a bed of flowers, which floats on the water. It is a magnificent picture, full of merit and deep interest. It will serve as a feature, and as such will be a credit to any bill.

"A Temporary Millionaire" (Solax), October 11.—The doings of an insane man are very seldom amusing. A lunatic and his performances occupy most of this film. It is rather long and very, very slow. This reviewer has never seen a Solax comic picture that was so dull as this.

"Chasing the Rainbow" (Rex), October 12.—Little Helen Anderson plays the little barefoot girl in this picture who was told by an old gentleman that there was a pot of gold at end of the rainbow. She needed money. Her mother's medicine bottle was empty and the druggist wouldn't refill it without money. She followed, and followed, till the rainbow faded away, but she found no gold. She was lost. It becomes dark; she sees an arch of electric lights over a roof garden, and she darts in for the golden find. It chances that a great opera singer is there, and when they are putting the child out she interferes; and when she hears the child's story, rises and sings and afterward, great singer that she is, passes the hat. All the while the little barefoot Nellie is carrying the empty bottle. There's a quality in it that makes one gulp. The singer goes home with Nellie, and we are given a clever picture of an East-Side tenement house roof on a hot night. It's a fine picture. It will be popular, for it is surely worth seeing.

"A Narrow Escape" (Reliance), October 14.—A man out of work is often sorely tempted. This picture, in its statement of these temptations, in spite of very good acting, seems largely conventional, that is, taken from other pictures or stories and not from life. However, the main incident, the picture's reason of being, is not only fresh but pleasant. The man's wife saved him from joining two burglars who were caught and shot by the police. The man also got a good job the next day. William Walthall plays the workman; Miss Ruth Robinson, the wife; and Baby Rosanna, their child. The picture leaves a pleasant impression. The players are pleasing and their acting commendable. It makes a good picture. The photography was not perfect, though some of its scenes were very well done.

"Mutt and Jeff and the Black Hand" (Nestor), October 14.—Mutt and his elderly friend are in hard luck again, though Jeff turns out to be an old friend of the police captain and his trouble doesn't last long. They were taken for spies by a Black Hand gang and compelled to join the organization a few minutes before the police raided it. They were "pinched" with the others.

"Romance and Uppercuts" (Nestor), October 14.—A melodramatic picture of a village courtship with a city man as the foiled interloper. It is conventional in general outline, but there is a good deal of prettiness and idyllic beauty in its scenes; and on account of this and of the naturalness of the players' work, the impression of the picture is very pleasing. The story is skillfully managed and doesn't drag. The hero's city cousin came on a visit and filled the fiancée's mind with lies about the city, till she was ready to run away with him. The lover finds the two at the station. The villain doesn't give in at once and the hero has to adminster a few uppercuts. The weakness of all pictures of this kind is in the heroine's uncommendable flightiness.

"Running Fawn's Chief" (Powers), October 14.—The audience didn't show any great enthusiasm for this picture. It is in the same backgrounds that we have seen very often in other pictures by Powers. Running Fawn saved her chief's life when the half-breed was about to stab him with a knife plainly made of wood. One good thing in it comes after Running Fawn's wedding. Taking the cue from the minister, the white friends "beat the chief to it" in kissing the bride, but big chief wouldn't stand for it. The picture will hardly be very popular.

"Let Us Smooth the Way" (Nestor), October 11.—There is very little that is romantic in this picture of life. It is true, in the sense that it stands for a typical experience, and it's a pity that it's true. By its title we know that it's a picture with a purpose, and a more worthy purpose could hardly be found for a picture. The man has grown old in harness. He is a draftsman and he has come to the time when he needs spectacles. The management of the company he works for is changed and he loses his job. For a day or so he keeps it from his wife, hoping to find other work. The picture takes him the whole way along the bitter path to his wife's death and beyond to the poorhouse. It isn't entertainment, but there are times when something else is more desirable. Everyone must look forward to old age, many with trembling. Let the people see this picture. They will, if they are human, be thankful for it, even though it will make no one happy.

"A Dog in a Coiner's Den" (Lux), October 13.—A mystery story after the conventional detective story model, but with a thrill in it that is a bit more thrilling than any we have yet known. The hero, an honest young man, discovers the den of the counterfeiters, but is himself caught. They tie him down and light a fuse connected with a barrel of gunpowder. The powder really goes off; but the young man's faithful dog has arrived in time to set him free, and he just escapes. It is very well conducted and is truly a thriller.

"Bill the Cyclist" (Lux), October 13.—Bill takes a job as bicycle cop. He has many hard knocks during a thief chase. A picture of Bill's kiddie is shown. He points out the way. It is not a very interesting film.

"Tweedledum and His Tricks" (Ambrosio), October 14.—He dresses up in woman's clothes and looks feminine. All the men on the street follow, ogling. It is not refined; comes near to being very coarse.

"Tweedledum's Monkey" (Ambrosio), October 14.—The monkey is a contortionist dressed up and has a tail. It is a crockery-breaking farce. No one was enthusiastic. In spite of all the damage it is slow.

"The Little Chimney Sweep" (Ambrosio), October 11.—This picture with its sentimental leaders will amuse American audiences. Though the picture's scenes seldom lack beauty, and some of them are lovely, the method and sentiment of it, as a whole, would make one suspect that it was taken from a Godey's Lady's Book of 1830 issue. The picture is commendable as being quite out of the ordinary run. It is not likely to displease anyone, and may please some people very much indeed.

"The Higher Law" (Thanhouser), October 10.—A young widow, too poor to support her child, has left it in a minister's care and has taken a position as companion with a woman who travels much. This woman leaves her a fortune and she comes back for her child. The minister loves the child. He claims that the child is his by every right. The mother, he claims, cannot even recognize her among other children. The mother tries and truly cannot. But the child's heart needs a mother's sympathy. The child by chance meets the mother, and they soon are great friends. The minister, finding them together, recognizes the higher law and gives up the child. It is well acted and commendable.

"The Tempter and Dan Cupid" (Thanhouser), October 13.—A very pleasing picture, like the old morality plays of the early stage. In it Dan Cupid is the opponent of Satan, and the prize is the soul of a young man. The settings and costumes are romantic and pleasing. The youth is tempted by Satan to steal from his father and to gamble. He falls, but is forgiven by his father. Cupid now shoots him with an arrow and he falls in love with a beautiful maiden. Satan doesn't give him up easily, but Cupid wins in the end. It is fairly well acted within limitations, and the picture has many charming scenes. It is likely to please very much.

"What the Indians Did" (Champion), October 11.—It was wonderful; they stole a lot of U. S. uniforms and went on the warpath. They were also the means, indirectly, of straightening out a romantic tangle at the ranch; for the owner of the ranch and father of a fair daughter, with a rich man who wanted to marry the daughter, were placed in danger and were saved by the sturdy foreman who was loved by the girl. The girl had promised to wed the rich man to save her father from ruin; but after the rescue the man gives her up. One of the astonishing things in the picture is the garb in which the cowboys make their attack. It is war-feathers that the Indians discarded when they began the raid in uniforms. The very impossibility of these occurences is a high merit in this picture.

"Thou Shalt Not Steal" (Powers), October 10.—The dominie's "treasures" (so he told the men) were in the trunk that was last to be placed on the moving van. The men stole the trunk. It was heavy. They had many well-photographed difficulties in getting away with it. They found it full of sermons. As a giver of amusement it is so—so.

..."The Large Lakes of Italy" (Powers), October 10.—This film begins with some very well and beautifully photographed pictures of well-known Italian lakes. It is short, but very good.

"The Indian Rustlers" (Bison), October 13.—The cowboy, out in the woods spooning with his girl, is met by Indians stealing cattle from the ranch. This incident, with the pistol fight that ensues, is not made convincing. The cowboys hear the shots and rush to help their pal. The Indians in the tepees hear shots and gallop to reinforce their brethren. The two parties meet, and there's a fighting chase across well-photographed forest glades and a stream of quiet water. It is not up to Bison standard in any department, production or photographic, but it is exciting for a moment or two.

"The Pioneer's Mistake" (Bison), October 10.—The pioneer thought that the chief's feathers were the tail of a turkey, and fired. He hit, but didn't wholly disable the Indian, who managed to get home and make a powerful harangue, which sent the braves on the warpath. The attack is not wholly convincing, nor is the rescue of the settlers. The picture is not far below the usual story of its kind, but it is hardly up to Bison standard. It surely isn't in photography. It is a bit weaker than usual, not in its situation, but in the development. However, that is criticising it by contrast with the best. It is a fairly interesting picture.

"Society Hoboes" (Yankee), October 13.—An amusing farce in which are pictured the experiences of four society men who for a joke went a-tramping. They, in the first adventure, were locked in an empty freight car. When they were at length released they supposed that they had been carried out West. Some real tramps took their clothes; and dressed in the togs the tramps left for them, they have to work for a dinner. A hearty laugh comes when the four are pictured as being arrested and brought before a magistrate, who gives them a half-hour to get out of Hackensack. There is another amusing, though very artificial, situation when they reach home, for their wives don't recognize them. The farce's best quality is the freshness of most of it. It is good light entertainment.

"His Second Wife" (Yankee), October 9.—He was a playwright. His first wife, the big-eyed one, left him. He was a failure, she said, and she wanted pleasure. Then he got a hearing; his play was accepted, but he broke down. A girl was kind to him in his trouble, and when he became successful, he got a divorce from his first wife and married the other girl. The first wife, in the depths of degradation, looks through the window of the new home and sees a happy family scene. Many of the scenes of this interesting and acceptable picture are very good indeed. There is not much originality in it; but it is pretty.

"The Better Way" (Imp), October 12.—Two or three years ago a very clever vaudeville sketch called "The Undertow" was going the rounds of the different circuits. The same story is here told in pictures, but much that is merely implied in the sketch is fully told in the film story. The hero is just out of prison and is in love with and marries a good little woman. He is trying to lead an honest life, but the "undertow" (the influence of both his old associates and of the police) is very hard to contend with. The climax is brought about by a woman of the streets who comes to his room and tells his wife that she is going to get him back in the old ways again. He is absent, having gone for a doctor to help a child whom he has just rescued. The evil woman hides her purse and accuses him of theft. The policeman finds the purse and is about to make an arrest when he discovers that the hurt child is his own. The trouble is then straightened out. The picture has what one may safely call a grip.

"The Last G. A. R. Parade, at Rochester, N. Y. (Imp), October 9.—This picture has greater interest than even an ordinary G. A. R. parade could give it. This was the last parade of the Grand Army. It is reported that they decided to have no more parades at the annual encampments. It is well worth seeing.

"The Sentinels Asleep" (Imp), October 9.—A Napoleon anecdote told in pictures. The great general found the sentinel asleep. He was about to run him through with his sword, but the man murmured the name Josephine, his sweetheart's name, and Napoleon himself, letting the man sleep, mounted guard in his stead. The sweetheart comes, and Napoleon in the darkness makes her think that he is the sentinel. The picture is very pleasing, not because it is convincing, for it isn't, but because it is romantic.

"Better to Have Remained Blind" (Eclair), October 9.—A pathetic picture showing how a woman recovered her sight and found that her husband was unfaithful. The shock was too much and she dies from the effects.

"The Motor Chair" (Eclair), October 9.—A comedy which shows a very wonderful chair that carried a man's mother-in-law away, but was easily stopped by the hand of a child. It starts things up some in the progress, however.

"National Guard Encampment at Ft. Riley" (Champion), October 9.—It shows an encampment, guard mounting (part of it) and the putting up of a big tent in record-breaking time. Also camp sports, including a rattling good wrestling match.

"The Cowboy and the Outlaw" (American), October 12.—Why should an outlaw risk his life to help a hurt cowboy whom a few moments before he had been ready to kill? "Human nature"—that is what the scenario writer would answer. In this picture, the producer has made it convincing. "American" pictures, though they are Westerns, seldom depend on the obvious. The first part of this picture (showing how the outlaw took the cowboy's horse, and also how, after he had directed the sheriff, fell while climbing over rocks and was found by the outlaw, who helped him), tells a good human story. But that the girl the cowboy loved should fall in love with the outlaw on sight, and the cowboy risk his life to let the outlaw escape is somewhat forced. It is surely a well-acted picture for the most part. It is only partly well photographed. It is a fair picture.

"The Land Thieves" (American), October 9.—Rangers to the rescue and the band of thieves wiped out. The brave homesteader refused to be intimidated. He was warned, but he had a right to the land and the thieves "got him" from ambush. They then made war on the wife and daughter. The cowboys, including the girl's lover, are warned just in time to save them. The acting is all good. Some of the scenes are clear and very well designed. It's a good Western picture.

ECLAIR AMERICAN PREMIER POSTPONED.

The American Eclair Company announce a postponement of their first release to November 21st, to allow time for enlarging and perfecting the production of "Hands Across the Sea in '76." The trade has been looking forward to this issue from the new American studio with a great deal of expectancy, as is evidenced by the many inquiries received at the company's office and the delay, while a disappointment to many of the exchanges who had placed orders for the Eclair product, cannot but eventually result satisfactorily when the quality of the production is considered, in its elaborate dress.

"Hands Across the Sea" is fully explained in a handsome eight-page booklet which is now being distributed. Briefly, the story has to do with the War of the Revolution and introduces many noted characters and scenes. The introduction of Lafayette and Rochambeau, together with their French soldiers and the subsequent part they played in strengthening Washington's army and making possible our independence seems most appropriate, as the Eclair Company is controlled by both French and American interests. Naturally, a strong network of love and hate enmeshes the atmosphere of war and strife. Plenty of heart interest prevails throughout the production with two great battles and several additional "big" scenes in satisfying contrast.

Among the prominent interiors shown, perhaps the court of France, during the reign of Louis XVI, is the most impressive, while the ball room of Washington's home at Mt. Vernon, as the minuet is being danced, is shown in all its quaint and natural realism.

Two reels make up the production of "Hands Across the Sea in '76" and they will be released simultaneously. A handsome lobby display has been gotten out to properly exploit this important film. This consists of two one-sheet posters, one mammoth lobby hanger, 42 x 84 inches, done in six colors, and a fine collection of actual photos of the various big scenes.

While the release of two reels together seems out of the ordinary, in regular channels, the Eclair Company are only anticipating and meeting popular demand in this respect.

BILL BUMPER'S BARGAIN.

A Comedy Burlesque on Faust by the Essanay Company.

Always topping the mark in laughable comedy and comic pictures, the Essanay Company bats a clean 1,000 average with "Bill Bumper's Bargain," a comedy burlesque on Faust soon to be released.

This film is a distinct novelty, and one that is certain to prove a winner with picture audiences wherever shown. The story is brisk, and reels along with a snap that is irresistible because of the abundance of humorous and striking situations. It is built about the doings of Bill Bumper, a perfect specimen of the "hobo" type, who picks up a book that has been dropped by a young lady on entering her home, and finds it to be the libretto of Faust. Bill immediately becomes absorbed in its reading and takes a comfortable seat on an adjacent doorstep for further perusal, only to be shooed on his way by a rude policeman. Still immersed in the pages, Bill wanders in front of a building in course of construction and is upset by a heartless laborer while contentedly ensconced in a wheel-barrow, the laborer having no sympathies in common with the harassed characters Bill is absorbed in.

Reaching a quiet country lane, Bill reclines blissfully by the roadside and feels certain of no further interruptions, but an odoriferous auto shatters his peace and blinds him with swirling dust. Bill beats a hasty retreat to a hay-stack, stretches out in the hay, lights the stub of his "imperfecto," tosses the match carelessly aside and, for the steenth time, becomes immersed in the libretto.

Suddenly Bill starts up in alarm for, standing before him, is the evil form of Mephisto. Bill is on the point of fleeing for his life, but Mephisto restrains him, produces a document and, with a little smooth talk, persuades Bill to sign the following compact:

> "I sell my soul to his Satanic Majesty, who in return, grants me the privilege of being a millionaire for the space of twelve hours."

Bill's signature is hardly dry when the paper bursts into flame and the astonished tramp finds his rags have been marvelously transformed into highly fashionable togs by the mere wave of Mephisto's hand, also that he is plentifully supplied with money through the magic power of a wishing ring placed on his finger. Warning Bill that at midnight he must pay the penalty, Mephisto conveys him in a puff of smoke to the beautiful garden of the fair Marguerite, who is wandering among the flowers with her colored maid, Martha.

While Bill ardently wooes Marguerite, Mephisto flirts devilishly with Martha and takes her off among the flower-beds. With the power of the wishing ring, Bill now causes an auto to appear, assists Marguerite in and they drive to a swell cafe. Here they dine lavishly, Bill treating the crowd to wine and tipping the waiters with bills of large denomination.

They next attend the theater, where Bill sizes up the performers through an enormous spy-glass and tosses money promiscuously to the stage and among the scrambling audience.

Returning to Marguerite's mansion, Bill swings open the massive iron gate and turns, only to see his "affinity" vanish into thin air before his very eyes. Looking wildly at his watch, Bill is horrified to find it is but five minutes till midnight. His time is nearly up! With but one thought, to cheat Mephisto and escape with a fortune, Bill rubs his magic ring and several bags of gold whisk down at his feet. With a grin of triumph, Bill tosses them into the waiting auto and is on the point of following when—presto! Mephisto stands before him!

Bill Is Forced to Pay Dearly for His Twelve Hours of Pleasure.

In vain Bill begs for mercy, but Mephisto is merciless, grips him by the collar and they vanish in a puff of smoke.

Down, down, down to the very gateway of Hell poor Bill falls in the clutches of Mephisto. Looking up he spies an inscription over the entrance reading: "Leave All Hope Outside." Peering into the depths, Bill is blinded by the flashes of flame and choked by the brimstone fumes that assail him, tries to again plead for mercy, but Mephisto points him on with leering triumph and, kissing his useless money goodby, Bill tosses it to the winds and stumbles through the gate.

past fiery dragons and slimy serpents Mephisto leads poor Bill until they reach the heights overlooking the fiery pit, where two little imps are summoned and Bill is prodded and poked down into the flaming depths until the haunts of the demons, who are poking the everlasting fires, are reached. With yells of glee they prod Bill with their forks, chasing him about from one horrible place to another, until they capture and bring him back to where Mephisto stands on the heights. Suddenly a wave of his sword transforms the cavern into a swirling mist of fire and Bill, shrieking with terror, is surrounded by the dancing demons who prod and poke him while a rain of flame descends upon his unprotected head! And then—

Bill awakens with a yell of pain, to find himself lying in the burning haystack, touched off by his carelessly thrown match, and the enraged farmer jabbing him with a rusty pitch-fork!

In a cold sweat of terror, but thankful it has all been only a dream, Bill scrambles up and beats a hasty retreat across the field, leaving the old rube shaking his fist vainly after him as he gazes upon the burning stack.

It will at once be seen that this a comedy of extraordinary merit, and genuinely unique in plot. The scenes in "Hell" are lavishly staged, and the fire effects are brought out in the film with startling realism by means of tinting that leaves nothing to be desired. In the way of detail, the Essanay Company has left no stone unturned in making this production one of the very best of their comedy "hits," and the audience that appreciates original and humorous situations, cannot fail to find a laugh in every foot of "Bill Bumper's Bargain." Francis Bushman plays Mephisto, Harry Cashman is the tramp, and Dolores Cassinelli the Marguerite.

"HOW THEY STOPPED THE RUN ON THE BANK."

A Unique Comedy by Selig in which Two Hundred Motion Picture Exhibitors of Illinois Acted.

Over two hundred exhibitors and motion picture theater owners, members of the Illinois State Exhibitors' League, will watch themselves "act" in the unique comedy entitled "How They Stopped the Run on the Bank," to be released by the Selig Polyscope Company on October 19th. Friday, August 25th, it will be remembered, was an eventful day for the members of the Illinois State Exhibitors' League. It was "Selig Day" in Chicago, and everyone who could get away from business for the day joined the automobile parade and went out to the Selig plant, where they spent, to say the least, an interesting day. One of the "stunts" that Mr. Selig had planned was the participation in several scenes of the above story, by the exhibitors themselves.

The exhibitors took to this idea with a vim and the result was far better than had been anticipated by the most optimistic of the Selig producers. Briefly the plot of the story is as follows:

A rumor gains circulation to the effect that the Forest City State Bank, one of the oldest and most conservative institutions in the country, is hard pressed for funds and is about to go to the wall. This news spread like wildfire and a run is imminent. Mr. Church, the president (played by Charles Clary), calls into consultation the bank officials and they wire for money. The bank is perfectly solvent, but the momentary question is to stop the run and quiet the nigh frantic crowds until funds arrive. Mr. Church faces ruin and disgrace if the doors open before they are in a position to start paying off the deposits. Dorothy Church, the president's daughter, is engaged to young Dick Thatcher (played by George Cox). They have been to a circus in the afternoon, where they were much impressed by a ferocious looking lion, one of the main attractions of the show. They hear of the impending run as they are about to leave the circus grounds, and Dorothy (played by Miss Williams) gets the novel idea of stopping the run by securing the lion and his keeper and turning them loose in the bank building. They act upon the idea; the keeper is taken into their confidence and the lion is transported during the night to the bank. In the morning the newspapers of the city carry a scare head article telling of the escape of the lion from the circus grounds. When the doors of the bank are thrown open to the panic stricken crowd in the morning, and Duke, the lion, makes his appearance, one can readily imagine the pandemonium that breaks loose. The line of depositors tumble over each other in their wild scramble to get to places of safety and the run is quelled. Dorothy and Dick are rewarded by the president when he assures them that he will consent to an early marriage between them for having saved him from certain ruin.

The circus crowd and the mob of depositors were played by the enthusiastic exhibitors, under the able direction of Otis Turner, the Selig producer.

"THE WAIF" (Imp).

The Waif, a [illegible] picture filmed by the Imp Company, will be seen to please all classes as it has that appeal that reaches the heart. It is a distinct innovation in the way of a picture story and is an ambitious undertaking. The settings are very good, a number of the scenes being laid on a fresh-air farm where the unfortunate children from the congested portions of the city are given the benefits of pure air, the freedom of the fields and farms and nourishing food by charitably inclined people who are in sympathy with the movement. There is fidelity to facts and the incidents ring true. The fresh air farm is one of the best conducted institutions of its sort in the East and the photographs bear out the statement that the scenes are genuine. There is a pathetic story running through the film, that of an irascible old farmer who casts off his daughter on account of a forbidden marriage. She is widowed and he declines to assist her. She dies and leaves a boy, who struggles in the big city to eke out an existence by selling papers. He becomes ill and kind friends send him to the fresh air farm to recuperate. He goes in company with hundreds of others and wanders off the grounds to the farm of his grandparents. How he eventually wins over the calloused grandfather and finds a home with loving relatives is a sweet story, well told and admirably staged. It is a story that will surely win favor with parents and children.

VITAGRAPH'S "TALE OF TWO CITIES" ENTERTAINS ROYALTY.

A correspondent writes us from Calcutta that the Elphinstone Biograph Company, of that city, gave a special performance on the evening of September 2nd, under the patronage and presence of Lord and Lady Hardinge, His Highness the Maharaja of Patiala, His Honor the Lieutenant-Governor, His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief. Lady Creagh and Lady Hewet were also among the audience. The Viceroy's band was in attendance and furnished the music. The principal item on the program was the three-reel portrayal of Charles Dickens' "A Tale of Two Cities." The performance was highly appreciated by the distinguished audience.

"LADY GODIVA" (Vitagraph).

For release Saturday, October 21, the Vitagraph Company announces "Lady Godiva," a picture based upon the old English legend of the same title. The Vitagraph Company has succeeded in making not only a beautiful film, but one that presents much of the historical interest of the eleventh century, and the manners and customs of the people of the celebrated and quaint town of Coventry, made famous in the literature of many periods. There will be much anticipation on the part of the public to see how this subject is portrayed and to behold the animated illustrations of this remarkable legend which has furnished many an hour of pleasant pastime.

Many are familiar with the delightful story of the sacrifice of Lady Godiva, who agreed to ride naked through the streets of Coventry, that a severe tax imposed by her husband upon an impoverished people might be rescinded. The story relates at length how she accomplished the task. Mantled by her wealth of golden hair she rode a milk-white steed through the streets, after all the populace had been strictly enjoined to remain within doors and not to gaze upon her as she passed. Only one disobeys the injunction, and he, in punishment for his curiosity and disobedience, was stricken blind and ever afterward known as "Peeping Tom," which title is applied to all persons, up to this day, who commit a similar offense.

There are many dramatic situations in this picture, especially where the appearance of Lady Godiva is anticipated as she is about to start upon her journey. While the ride is in progress the scene suddenly changes to the chamber of "Peeping Tom," whose unrestrained inquisitiveness is suggestively contagious and fills us with a strong disapproval of the lack of appreciation he displays for the sacredness of the price of his and his neighbor's debts. Cautiously he approaches a crack in the window shutter, through which he tries to gaze upon the form of his benefactor. No sooner do his eyes penetrate the crevice than he is stricken blind. The acting of Mr. Wilson as "Peeping Tom" is a stroke of genius and art.

When Lady Godiva has passed through the ordeal and fulfilled her mission of love to those for whom she was willing to sacrifice so much, she is overcome with a full realization of her husband's severity and tyranny. This climax touches our sympathies and we grasp the refinement and culture displayed by Miss Swayne in acting this part so admirably and successfully—a matter not easy to accomplish.

AUSTIN DISASTER PICTURES BY HOWE.

Lyman H. Howe maintains at his office a crew of "emergency" photographers—camera men, who, like a fire engine or a wreck train, are always ready to rush at a moment's notice to photograph scenes of great human interest whenever or wherever they may occur. The advantage of such an ever-alert organization was well demonstrated when the first news of the terrible flood at Austin, Pa., was flashed to the world. As soon as the magnitude of the calamity became apparent, Mr. Howe's photographers were racing to Austin. They arrived there even before many of the newspaper reporters and long before any other photographers. The flood had subsided just before their arrival. They planted their cameras in the very center of the narrow little valley. From this point they photographed panoramic views showing the magnitude of the awful destruction caused by the irresistible wall of water 50 feet high, and the houses stranded by it in every conceivable position on the hillsides. Then they moved the cameras within very close range of the broken dam which exacted such a heavy toll of human lives and wiped a whole town off the map. After securing comprehensive views of it, they photographed the wreckage strewn all around them—just as it lay immediately after the deluge was over. But the human interest of this reproduction is intensified particularly by that portion showing the first work of relief and rescue, and some of the survivors still clinging to a few of the shattered homes which escaped the full fury of the flood.

Chas. L. Marshall, holder of the State rights in Missouri, Kansas and Iowa for "Temptations of a Great City" (Monopol) and Buffalo Bill and Pawnee Bill pictures, reports phenomenal bookings and business for those specials. Scientific advertising methods bring the crowds and return dates are the rule.

NEW PICTURE MAKERS.

The Crystal Film Company, recently organized to manufacture motion pictures, has opened offices in the German Savings Bank Building, Fourth Avenue and 14th Street. Mr. Ludwig G. B. Erb is president and Mr. Joseph A. Golden, who recently resigned as stage director of the Selig Polyscope Company of Chicago to take charge of the Company's studios, is vice-president.

"A RURAL CONQUEROR" (Lubin).

As old as the world is the fact that the soundness of a man's heart cannot be judged by the stylishness of his clothes nor the correctness of his manners.

A comedy which will soon be released by the Lubin Manufacturing Company, entitled "A Rural Conqueror," happily illustrates this time-honored truth.

Marjorie Thorne, a country girl, was sincerely loved by Ira Smiley, a handsome and intelligent young chap. However, Ira didn't look like the pictures that illustrate the tailor advertisements in the magazines, nor did he know how to make a Chesterfieldian bow.

When two girl chums arrived to visit Marjorie, she had plenty of society, and when the lovers of these two chums arrived, Marjorie could not help noticing the difference between them and Ira. Ira noticed that she noticed, and being a wise young man, he determined to correct these slight defects in his make-up. The next time he appeared, he had exchanged his plow shoes for patent leathers, his old hat for a silk one and his "store clothes" for a frock coat and gray trousers.

Very punctiliously he invited Marjorie to go for a drive. On the way he again asked her to become his wife, and again Marjorie refused. They had arrived at the middle of the river, which was shallow enough to be forded. Ira suddenly stopped, got out, unhitched the horse and sent it flying. Then he, too, started to walk away. Wildly Marjorie called him back. He came and inquired whether she would be his wife. "No," said Marjorie, and Ira started to walk away again. In the end, Marjorie accepted him, and he gallantly carried her ashore and most of the way home.

Arriving there, however, Marjorie again declared she would not be his wife. Ira said nothing, but calmly picked her up in his arms and announced that he was going to carry her back to the buggy. Then Marjorie gave up, for in her heart she had loved him all the time.

"THE CAVES OF LA JOLLA" (American).

An instructive and ruggedly beautiful scenic, of about one-half reel length, will be released in the near future by the American. "The Caves of La Jolla (pronounced Hoya)" is the title.

The scenes embrace views of the coastline of California, near Point Loma. The action of the waves on the rocks has created remarkable results. Here is a majestic natural bridge resting on pillars which have escaped erosion, the arches being formed by what were the tops of caves. There are stretches of stupendous rock walls, veritably honeycombed, and presenting weirdly fantastic, rock fashioned figures. Yonder the breakers dash mountain high on the towering cliffs, leaving partly uncovered, as they recede, "dark, unfathomed caves."

Attention is directed to a view of the coastline in which the rocks show distinctly the gradual rising of the land bordering on the Pacific. Geologists estimate that the rise is nearly three feet in a period of one hundred years.

For rugged sublimity and rock peculiarities, the scenes this well-photographed scenic film will afford instruction and pleasure for all.

HEALTH DEPARTMENT LECTURE ILLUSTRATED BY KALEM MOTION PICTURE.

One of the features of the New York City Budget Exhibit, recently held at 330 Broadway, was a lecture by Dr. E. J. Lederle, Commissioner of the Health Department, which was illustrated in a novel and interesting manner by the Kalem Company's motion picture, "The Little Mothers' League." This picture tells the story of the Health Department's work in educating young girls in the proper care of babies, the League now consisting of 20,000 girls who live in the congested districts of New York and who are the caretakers of their baby brothers and sisters. The manner in which pasteurized milk is dispensed to mothers, the lessons in modifying milk, cleansing bottles and the general care of infants, are all embodied in this film. It is a striking example of the wonderful field for educational subjects in motion pictures and as Dr. Lederle said, "It's exhibition throughout the country, as well as in Europe, will enable other cities to see what New York is doing in its great work of decreasing infant mortality."

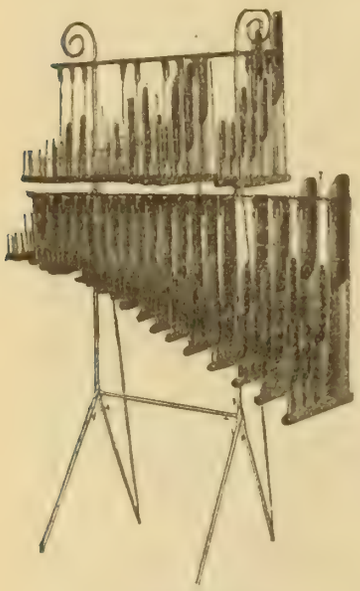
A LITTLE TALK ON VAUDEVILLE IN PICTURE THEATERS.

The question of vaudeville in the 5-cent theater is quite a problem for the manager of the photoplay house. Vaudeville is an item of considerable expense, and it is a moot point whether the enterprising manager can at the end of the week show a comfortable excess or gain on the credit side, meaning greatly increased patronage due to this added attraction. If vaudeville shall be considered an attraction, it must be good, and very good indeed, and good vaudeville acts cost a great deal of money. Cheap vaudeville is out of the question. It is absolutely detrimental, and has proved the fall-down of more than one exhibitor. Strange as it may appear, yet it is a fact, the public, when it comes to vaudeville, expects for a nickel an entertainment as good as at a high-class vaudeville house. Mediocre performers are hardly tolerated, and are not on a par with the extreme satisfaction of a corking good picture. And then there is always the danger that the manager, burdened with the extra expense of vaudeville, is tempted to cut on his film service, for which his patrons will not stand.

Very little attention so far seems to have been given to the possibilities of a musical entertainment in conjunction with the moving picture show. Illustrated songs and good singers always have been more or less an attraction, but the possibilities of musical novelties have been rather overlooked by exhibitors.

There is a manufacturer in Chicago—his name is J. C. Deagan—who has made a specialty of novelty instruments exceptionally well adapted for use in the picture theater. He is the originator of the well-known Deagan electric bells, which are used by hundreds of exhibitors all over the country, as a genuine and pleasing novelty. Some very startling effects can be produced with these bells, as, for instance, by mounting them under seats, in corners, and other odd places, to the intense surprise and delight of the audience. Some exhibitors use the bells as ballyhoo, and mount them as a decoration on the outside.

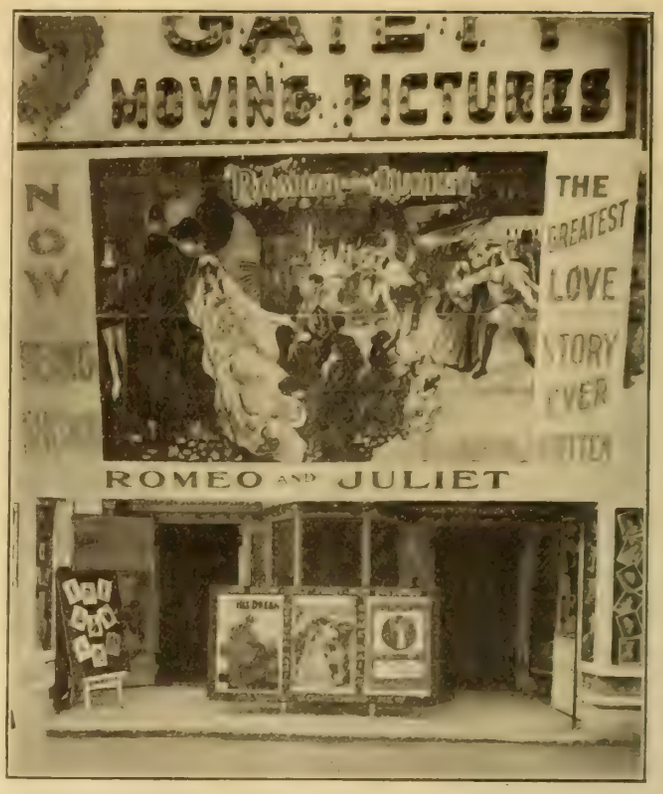


Organ Chimes.

Of course, if abused, the novelty will grow tiresome, and therefore should be judiciously employed. A drummer, for instance, should never play the bells with the pictures. To accompany the chorus of an illustrated song, the bells are most effective.

Another novelty of tested merit is the Deagan organ chimes, an instrument particularly well adapted to the moving picture theater. This instrument is toned as sweet and mellow as a pipe organ; the quality of the tone is clear and penetrating. The cost of this instrument is very moderate, and the chimes are easily played by the drummer or pianist. The music of this instrument can be featured as well as a vaudeville act.

A policy which might well be followed by the enterprising manager who now has vaudeville would be to buy, for the money spent each week or two weeks for vaudeville, one of the better musical novelties. This could be featured for its first week, a new one bought the next week, until the house has acquired a permanent equipment of say six or more high-class novelties. The cost of following such a policy would not exceed, in fact would not always equal, the expense of a first-class act; and after the first week of use, the instrument would have earned its cost, would be the property of the house, and would be always ready for a return engagement, as well as always pleasing to the audience, if not used too much. As an attraction, too, it would prove superior to the average act, and the extra attendance would go far toward paying for it. To avoid repetition, it would of course be necessary to have enough instruments, running each one say a week, to give a program for a month or more without repeating. After a few months, moreover, the instruments will have paid for themselves, even though a large number has been bought, and are a permanent asset.



GAIETY THEATER, MONTREAL.

The Gaiety of Montreal cleared $300 profit after a three days' run of the Thanhouser two-reel production of Romeo and Juliet. The manager writes that the success of the pictures were phenomenal. All of the highest averages of previous successes were broken.

The Gaiety advertised the pictures well in advance. It plastered up the front of the house, as the cut shows, with one sheets and three sheets.

It covered the town with handbills and posters. The results far exceeded their most optimistic expectations. The returns they got not only demonstrates what live-wire advertising methods will do, but illustrates the drawing power of classic films.

ORTHO STOCK COMPANY.

The Ortho Film Company, which has announced its forthcoming releases in the Moving Picture World, has established its own company of players in a new studio and producing plant at Petersburg, Va. The leading players are well known in the theatrical world. Miss Elizabeth Talmage has appeared in a number of dramatic successes. She was with Amelia Bingham in "The Climbers," with Valerie Bergere in "The Dancing Girl"; played the prima donna part in "The Love Waltz," and the part of Emma in "Paid in Full." She is the leading woman in the Ortho company.

Jack Dougherty, one of the leading men, was with the Virginian and Arizona companies and has appeared in many other dramatic companies. Miss Gertrude DeMont is the comedienne of the Ortho company and has been in a number of Brady and Harris successes. Walter Marshall, heavy, has been with Savage and Shubert productions for the past several years. Miss Virginia Mann, juvenile and ingenué, was featured in "Prince Chap" and "The Gentleman from Mississippi." She is a beautiful brunette and greatly interested in picture work.

Miss Effie Darling, who is cast for heavies with the Ortho company, is a former Belasco player and has a wide theatrical experience. William Steen, juveniles, is a handsome fellow and a promising young actor.

The direction of the company will be in charge of Mr. James Doyle, formerly with the Reliance and other companies. He is an actor of wide reputation and has been a producing director on Broadway for years. Mr. Doyle will be assisted by Mr. Frank Young, who is also a well-known character man. He will assist in arranging scenarios and will play character parts.

A competent staff of photographers and scenic artists are with the company at the new studios and an excellent line of pictures is promised. The commercial department of the Ortho Company is at 40 East 12th Street, New York.

GIVING THE AUDIENCE A CHANCE.

It is one of the tricks of the music hall singer to get the audience to join in the chorus of his or her popular song, and the popularity of the song and the singer is gauged by the enthusiasm with which the audience joins in the chorus. When the chorus is catchy and the singer pursuasive the response from the audience is sometimes wonderful and many a singer's reputation has been made thereby. Taking this for an example, some one conceived the idea of featuring the popular song choruses on the screen without the singer and giving the audience a chance to get into the program. This idea was first put on at the Circle Theater, New York, and called "Golden's Song Review." The words of the chorus were put on lantern slides and projected on the picture screen. When the orchestra begins to play the audience begins to sing and everybody has a good time.

How this idea works is best shown at the Circle Theater, where it has been running for some weeks. If you happen in at the right time, as did a representative of the Moving Picture World, you are likely to think that you have made a mistake and stumbled into a big meeting of some singing society instead of a vaudeville theater. The idea has become so popular with the clientele of the Circle that the greater majority of them come especially for the song revue and they have the time of their lives, making the old theater fairly ring with song.

The chorus slides are made by the Levi Company, of New York, and can be obtained at a very reasonable price. Mr. Meinhold, of the Loew enterprises, which operates the Circle Theater, gives the Golden Song Revue the following unqualified indorsement:

"It is absolutely the biggest attraction on slides we have ever used and we are placing them in every one of our houses as rapidly as the Levi Company can produce them. Night after night the same patrons come back to sing and I believe we have around here now the best singers in New York. I don't know how long it will last, but we have been using it here almost three months and it is a bigger attraction to-day than it ever was. The only difficulty we find is to get enough cartoons and choruses. I have not hesitated to recommend it to my friends or to anybody who wants a first class attraction for almost nothing. You don't always have to pay a big price for a good drawing card if you are wide awake and know your business."

SUNLIGHT CURTAIN DEMONSTRATION.

A remarkable demonstration of the Sunlight Curtain was recently witnessed by a World representative in the rooms of the Kinemacolor Company, 145 West 45th Street, New York City. The exhibition room of this company is equipped with the customary painted white screen, much whiter and much smoother than seen in the ordinary theater, and it shows up the Urban-Smith color effects well. On this occasion, however, one half the screen was covered with a Sunlight Curtain and the difference was very pronounced. The Sunlight curtain seemed to render the natural colors more natural in that they appeared with more purity; but the difference in the effect was most noticeable in the highlights. It has been said that the highlights or whites in a Kinemacolor picture are only relative, and this was proven to be correct when comparing the difference of the effects on the two screens. On the Sunlight half the highlights were brilliant and the faces of the people in the pictures were clear and the flesh colors faithfully rendered. It is hard to say whether the demonstration favored Kinemacolor or the Sunlight curtain the most, but it at least demonstrated one thing conclusively, and that is that they ought to go together.

OWEN MOORE AND LITTLE MARY WITH MAJESTIC.

Tom Cochrane, general manager of the Majestic Film Company, New York, announces that he has finally secured the services of Owen Moore and Mary Pickford (Little Mary), and that they will hereafter appear only in Majestic pictures. There was some question for a time if the Majestic would be able to secure these popular players, as another company claimed to have them under contract. An action was brought to prevent them from going with the Majestic, but the case was dismissed by the Court when it came up for a hearing. This left them free to contract with Mr. Cochrane's company.

NEW $100,000 THEATER.

Ornstein & Bock, proprietors of the St. Nicholas Theater, on St. Nicholas Avenue and 181st Street, are just completing the construction of a new and model theater building at a cost of $100,000. The opening date has not been announced, but the amusement-loving patrons of the section are looking forward to an early opening. Messrs. Ornstein and Bock, though in the business only two years, deserve credit for the manner in which they have conducted the St. Nicholas.

THE X-RAYS.

Pathe Freres will release at an early date one of the most interesting educational and scientific films ever produced. The full details of an X-ray machine are exhibited and explained upon the screen, showing the construction and methods of using the same. The operator next takes an X-ray picture of his own hand, which shows how the machine is worked; the negative of this picture is then developed and the most extraordinary picture ever seen upon the screen is the development of this plate in the dark-room; it is, however, actually seen upon the screen slowly developing in the acid bath. When fully developed, the human hand with the bones in distinct outline are plainly seen.

A frog is then taken from a jar and placed under the X-ray and the picture thus taken of the frog is also simultaneously reproduced by the cinematograph and on the screen can be seen the living frog trying to liberate itself from the pins which hold it. Also with thorough transparency the skeleton of this little animal is distinctly outlined. The whole series is indeed wonderful, as the uninitiated cannot comprehend how the reproduction of dark-room pictures and the simultaneous pictures of the X-ray and the cinematograph are produced. It is an exceedingly valuable film, and will be welcomed by everyone interested in the educational and scientific development of moving picture uses. This film is probably one of the most instructive ever issued and is a valuable illustration of the possibilities yet to follow.

Adam Kessel, the "Empire Exchange" man, hates to see the warm weather leave us. He has followed the sun's rays to Palm Beach, Fla., where [illegible] himself for the next ten days to come.

NEW FILM RENTAL BUREAU.

The Amusement Supply Company, of Chicago, Ill., announces the fact that beginning with October 1st they will add to their already large and well-known business a film rental department, under the management of Mr. Robert D. Lett, formerly of the H. & H. Film Service, of Chicago, and more recently manager of the Reliable Film Exchange of that city. It is the purpose of the Amusement Supply Company to handle a high class of Independent film, and in addition they will make a specialty of feature reels. The company has recently moved into much larger quarters and will be glad to correspond with such exhibitors as would care to contract for a really first-class weekly service.

ACME FILM COMPANY IN NEW QUARTERS.

The Acme Film Co., formerly located in offices at 12 East 15th Street, New York, has moved to 130 West 37th Street. The change was made necessary by a rapid increase of business which has favored the company during the past few weeks. The new offices are commodious and better fitted for the business of the company.

THREE NESTORS COMING.

The Nestor Company announces that there will soon be three "Nestors" each week in response to the increased demand for more of the same. It is proposed to make the third reel one of high class comedies and light drama. Thomas Ricketts, the well-known and efficient director, will have charge of this work.

LETTER FOR WILLIAM B. HALL.

(2) Mr. Johnson should be addressed in care of the Lubin company. See their advertisement for address. (3) All Biograph players are either John or Jane Doe. John Doe played the part mentioned. (4) Miss Pickford was with the Imp for about a year.

G. D.—It is not recorded that Gilbert M. Anderson has a brother in the pictures. (2) He is in charge of the Essanay players in the West, with headquarters in Los Angeles, but they go wherever good settings are to be had. (3) Kenneth Casey and Adele de Garde are not related.

COOK.—The scene was not a "studio exterior," but a natural setting, made, as you suggest, on the Brighton Beach line.

A. N. D.—If you want to be popular use only one side of the paper (1) Robert Leonard has left the Selig company. (2) No. (3) Announcement will be made in a week or so as to the plans for the Western section of the Vitagraph players. The company is not yet in the field, pending the completion of elaborate details. (4) We cannot place "the finest picture house in the United States," but you're pretty close to about as good as there are with the Montgomery houses. There are numerous handsome houses throughout the country, but it is not possible to institute comparisons. (5) The honor seems to lie between the Selig and Lubin companies. (6) Will be answered later. (7) Miss Lottie Briscoe is now in Philadelphia. (8) Miss Edith Storey is permanently with the Vitagraph. (9) The company does not place the actor. (10) We are inclined to the belief that the Vitagraph has the larger number of players steadily employed, since it makes the greater number of releases. They sometimes work as many as ten companies at once. (11) For cue music see Clarence E. Sinn's advertisement in this issue. (12) Miss Lawrence is still with the Lubin company.

G. E.—John, in "The Quaker Mother," was played by Maurice Costello. (2) Lieut. Lewis in the Essanay "Live, Love and Believe," was Francis Bushman.

J. F. McN.—We do not answer questions as to relationships. (2) Sydney Ayers has the lead in Selig's "The Heart of John Barlow." (3) If you will write the Vitagraph company they will advise you if they have the photograph asked for. They offer for sale photographs of most of their players. (4) The answer was correct at the time of writing.

ART.—Miss Alice Joyce is by no means the only artist's model in photoplays. Miss Dorothy Gibson, of the new Eclair studio, was one of Harrison Fisher's favorite models before she left the artist's for the photoplay studio. It is necessary, however, to be able to act in order to gain a place with a photoplay company, unless you are content to appear in minor parts which may lead to something better.

L. T. B.—The Thanhouser Kid has no other name for picture purposes, and what better name could you ask? (2) Inda Palmer played the part you mentioned. (3) The Mutt and Jeff pictures are made by arrangement with the artist, but are not taken from the published sketches. (4) Hank and Lank was a series done by Essanay. The two have no connection.

T. V. B.—Gilbert M. Anderson is the player to whom you refer. See answer to G. D. (2) We cannot give you a letter of introduction to "some director." What good would it do since we cannot advise him as to your ability?

VAN.—The production was played by the nameless Biograph actors.

F. I. P.—We explained last week that James Kirkwood was still with Reliance. (2) "A Hot Time in Atlantic City," will be practically the same as the first release of that title, but done with the improvement in action and photography that has marked the Lubin product in the past couple of years.

A. J. R.—Wifie's mamma is an old Lubin release. The mother-in-law was Florence Wragland. Her death was recorded last spring.

A. D. M.—Jane Fearnley is the Reliance player concerning whom you ask. Miss Leonard has not been with the company for some time.

B. A. B.—We do not know "what became of all the pretty girls with Nat Wills in the King of Kazzam." Perhaps some of them will find employment again now that the Powers studio is ready for occupancy. (2) Jack Standing played the lead in the Lubin "A Good Turn."

C. D. Y.—You might make a sale of a photoplay done in story form, but the chances are against you. Write it in action instead of narrative and mark it out into scenes. You'll probably get from $20 to $35 at the start for your scenarios and less in case a story is taken which the director must work over.

N. E. R.—We do not supply personal addresses. Write the player in care of the company with which he is connected. (2) Photographs of the players may be had by addressing the company, though this does not apply to all companies.

T. M. S.—George Melford played the husband in Kalem's "The Bolted Door." (2) The Kalem company has four regular companies, three of which are usually in the field.

P. M. L.—Otis Thayer played Dick in Selig's "The New Editor." (2) The animals of the Selig pictures are the property of the company. (3) Gilbert Anderson did not employ a double in the fight scene of Spike Shannon. He is handy with the gloves himself.

R. T. S.—Charles Seay is still with the Edison company. (2) Marie Tenner was with the Lubin company for a time.

B. M. G.—We do not know where Miss Florence Turner spent her vacation, so cannot tell whether it was "the same Miss Turner." She has dark hair.

D. B. T.—Mrs. Mary Maurice is not the mother of Maurice Costello, nor is Leo Delaney his brother. (2) As to the Biograph players—Officer, he's in again!

W. W. G.—King Baggot is still with the Imp company. Ask the company about his photograph.

J. K.—Simply send your scenario to the company with a return stamped envelope if you want it back in the event of non-acceptance.

B. P. F.—Warren Kerrigan is leading man for the American. (2) The company has no New York studio. The home office is in Chicago, but the pictures are made in the West.

A. M. G.—The Boer war picture is Briton v. Boer, made by the Selig company, and is therefore a licensed released, though we have seen a copy recently in an independent theater. (2) We don't know how it happened.

F. W. L.—Miss Turner is not dead. This goes for all the rest of the weekly victims of the rumor club and answers half a dozen other inquirers.

J. W. R.—The Eclair company is buying American scenarios. Address in the advertising section.

N. T. G.—We do not know how it happens that Miss Normand changed her connection. It does not appear to be one of those matters belonging to this department.

H. N. L.—Time was when the photoplayers were paid a flat five dollars a day, but that was long ago. Now salaries range from $3 a day to $500 a week. There are more of the former.

B. V. C.—Robert Conness played the husband in Edison's "His Misjudgment. (2) The name of the valet is not made known, but he was a native of Japan. (3) William Bechtel has gone back to the stage, we understand.

I. L. P.—Miss Gladys Fields is the leading woman for the Western Essanay productions. We do not know how old she is and far be it from us to ask.

R. M.—We do not regard questions as to the relative worth of two film producers as coming within the province of this department. (2) We know of no company carrying a portable studio. The more common practice is to take to the field for the outside scenes and make the interiors on returning to the studio. (3) The idea of using "real" wall paper in interior scenes is not new. The Lubin company carried this to a high point of perfection for a time, but the practice involves delay while the paper dries. (4) Some company may be willing to pay you a small sum for this idea if it can be worked out. It cannot be put out on royalty as you suggest. (5) We have no record of a film showing the blowing open of a safe. It would be less convincing than a tricked picture. Actual safe blowing was a feature of "A Dark Secret," one of the earliest of the tank dramas.

John Baxter's Ward

In the good old Western days, so rare was woman on the range that no sooner did she arrive than she was "spoken-for." This theme has been used before, but is always strong because it is so essentially human. There is humor in it always, but most authors treat it alike. We have produced it in a manner entirely at variance with any former version. A great big healthy hit.

On the Same Reel

The Little Brown Calf

"Nature teaches beasts to know their friends." wrote Shakespeare. Likewise: "There is a providence that takes care of children." The simplicity of childhood is the most wonderful thing in the world. The ways of a child are the ways of nature; more interesting by far than the sordid motives of men and women. A tale of childhood, the principal charm of which is sweet simplicity.

Revenue Officer's Last Case

Few who have not been among them can comprehend the bitter hatred of the moonshiners for the Revenue Man. For many years the Southern mountaineers have distilled their liquor. Their only desire is to be left in peace and it seems impossible to convince them that they are doing wrong. This is a great picture strong in dramatic action with a reasonable love theme throughout; ending happily and without fatalities.

CORRESPONDENCE

IN THE MISSISSIPPI VALLEY.

T. F. Muller has closed the airdome at Litchfield, Illinois, until next season.

Inasmuch as the leading business houses of Kankakee, Illinois, were holding their annual fall openings, the Court moving picture theater got in line and held an autumnal opening. This marked a change from Independent to Licensed service. The care given to details at this theater is evidenced by the selection of architect C. D. Henry, of Kankakee, to design two bill boards for the front of the theater.

The Park Theater Company of Chicago, has been incorporated, with a capital stock of $15,000, to do an amusement business. The incorporators are: Park Phipps, George Girling and Aaron C. Wendell.

Mrs. Richard McFadden has resigned her position as pianist at the Scenic Theater in Bradley, Illinois, to accept a like position in the Electric Theater, at Manteno, Illinois.

Moving pictures formed a large part of the first open meeting of the Oliniana Society of Hedding College, at Abingdon, Illinois.

The Star Theater, St. Charles, Illinois, has added vaudeville to its picture show.

Geneva, Illinois, club women believe they have solved the problem of abolishing the evil effects of the blood and thunder films upon young people. The Geneva Improvement Association has voted to open, equip and manage a censored moving picture show of its own, where young people may be shown only wholesome pictures. Their proposition to use the Unitarian church, met with one objection against its being turned into a playhouse, but other members and officials of the church agreed with the club women that the building might be used to an advantage in this work without interfering seriously with the regular religious services.

Dreamland of Chicago, has been incorporated, with a capital stock of $20,000, to do a general amusement business. The incorporators are: Frederick C. Eberts, Leo. S. Kositchek, Edwin D. Lawler.

The committee on public safety of the LaSalle, Illinois, city council, made a number of recommendations after the inspection of the heaters of that city. It was noticed that no criticism was made on the operating rooms. Most of the suggestions were in regard to installing fire plugs, or hose, larger doors and removing rails from the end of seats in the balcony.

Miss Martha Russell, formerly leading woman with the Essanay company, is appearing in a number of Illinois cities, giving incidents of film making and showing in connection with these stories, the pictures in which she appeared.

Leonard & Gardner, of Virden, Illinois, are constructing a new building to house their moving picture show.

Basil Argerobolas, has changed the name of the moving picture show at Chestnut and Second Streets, Kewanee, Illinois, from the Princess to the Olympic. Flowers were given away as souvenirs on the opening day. Pictures will be changed daily.

A Moline, Illinois, woman who lost her pocketbook, was confident that the disappearance took place in the Lyric Theater. She reported the matter to the police, but the theater had been closed for the night, so the driver of the patrol wagon called at the home of one of the proprietors and secured a key. He also secured instructions about lighting the interior of the theater. When he opened the theater door he easily found the switch and pressed the button, but there was no illumination. He had started the orchestrion. Awed by the array of buttons, he did not know how to turn it off, and it went merrily on until something just happened, but he found the pocketbook, which contained $60, and the woman was happy.

Robert Storm has purchased the opera house at Rankin, Illinois, and is making a number of improvements.

The Columbia Theater, at Galva, Illinois, has been sold to Emery & Hutchinson, of the Princess, and Galva will have but one show. The proprietors will send the equipment to Toulon, Illinois, where they also own a show.

Zeddock Reddish, of Jerseyville, Ill., will add forty feet to his brick building, installing a stage and five hundred opera chairs. When road shows do not conflict, he will offer a moving picture show.

The Family Theater, Sterling, Illinois, Shrader & Beghtol, has adopted a policy of alternating pictures and illustrated songs at 5 cents, to be given Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday, while the other days will be given over to vaudeville.

H. W. Molchior has closed the Bijou Theater, on Chicago Street, at Freeport, Illinois.

As a result of the Men and Religion movement, which has begun in Moline, as well as through Illinois cities, it is expected to get 2,000 signers to the petition asking that moving picture theaters in Moline be closed on Sunday. This prayer is not directed at the photoplay alone, but to all sorts of Sunday amusements.

W. R. Hayes, John Forrester and Samuel Cotton, and others, have purchased the Majestic Theater at Du Quoin, Illinois. The company has been incorporated with $12,000 capital.

Lumer Hawkins has purchased the "Palace of Electricity," a moving picture show, at Hahomet, Ill.

The Grand Opera House Company, of Lawrenceville, Ill., has been incorporated, with capital stock of $12,000, to do an amusement business. The incorporators are: W. W. Willis, A. L. Maxwell and Charles P. Gore.

Musical instruments in moving picture theaters in Waterloo, Iowa, must be inside the building and at least twenty feet from the entrance, if a proposed ordinance passes. The measure also hits at "barkers." F. H. M.

A recent visit to the Savoy Theater on North Sixth Street, Springfield, Ill., showed a working force composed entirely of young women, barring the operator, of course, polite ushers, ticket seller, door keeper, piano player and singer, were noticeable.

The new theater to be opened by W. H. Evans and I. Burnstein, of Springfield, Ill., is not in this city, but at 521 Hampshire Street, Quincy, where the building has been remodeled.

The advent of the Illinois State Fair brought warning from Chief of Police Kramer, that every moving picture show in Springfield must have on duty, from 1.30 in the afternoon until 11.30 at night, a special police officer, approved by the chief of police. The duty of this police was to keep the aisles clear, seeing that the exits were accessible at all times.

Fred Hancock, of Quincy, is in charge of the Colonial, at Quincy, succeeding Mrs. Howard H. Tuggle, formerly of Springfield, Ill. F. H. M.

Mott & Reschner have purchased a site on Main Street, in Winona, Minn., and will erect a $50,000 fireproof theater, which will seat 1,000 persons.

Burr R. Swan, of Pittsfield, Ill., has purchased the lease on the Knights of Pythias Opera House, at Pittsfield, from Frank Field, and will operate the moving picture show, which has been a current attraction there.

William Ackerman, of Mason City, Ill., has leased the opera house at Petersburg, Ill., and will run a moving picture show when theatrical bookings do not conflict.

The Majestic, Springfield, which is playing high-class vaudeville recently, featured the film "Temptations of a Great City." The Grand had previously run the three reels.

Mr. and Mrs. Lot Noe, Lewiston, Ill., have started a tour of Illinois with a moving picture show.

W. Kee Maxwell, who livens up the editorial page of the Peoria Herald-Transcript when George Fitch is not to be diverted from the Siwash college story which he is writing, is another nationally recognized humorist who is a devotee of the picture shows. His latest fling at realism is the criticism of a film showing a church scene, in which all the front seats are filled and the back ones empty.

According to Fort Worth, Tex., papers the board of moving picture censors of that city have barred the "Dante's Inferno" films. No reason is given.

There are possibilities of a good story in films recently made in St. Louis showing two Mississippi river steamers racing. A scenario showing the days when the captain tied a negro on the safety valve to keep enough steam to beat out the rival packet would certainly be romantic.

The new theater on Main Street, Urbana, Ill., will be known as The Family. This name was selected in a prize competition.

The Advance Moving Picture Company, of Chicago, will take a number of pictures in Joliet, Ill., it is said.

Fire Prevention Association, according to press reports, Russell Moore, chairman of the committee, and deputy inspector of the Michigan inspection bureau, reported to have found considerable fault with the operating rooms. Openings for pic-

A nursery and children's playroom, where mothers may leave their children while they attend the moving picture shows at the Alhambra Theater, Milwaukee, Wis., is an innovation in photoplay enterprise. This room is fitted up with see-saws, rocking horses, sand piles, and other things to amuse the little ones. A competent attendant is there to care for the youngsters while the mothers are viewing the pictures.

Wonderland park, at Minneapolis, Minn., is to be wrecked, according to its owners.

H. H. Ling, of Cherokee, Iowa, has purchased the building in Sioux Rapids, Iowa, which formerly was used by the Young Men's Christian Association and will open a moving picture show in it.

Plans for the new Orpheum Theater, at Grand Rapids, Mich., which will cost $50,000, were drawn by Architect R. A. Leroy, of Kalamazoo, Mich. It is expected to have the structure completed by November 1.

The Beacon, at Paris, Ill., is waging a campaign against unsafe moving pictures, which has caused a local twist that can hardly be ignored by the photoplay managers of Paris.

Elks at Olney, Ill., have engaged Architect J. W. Gaddes, of Vincennes, Ind., to draw plans for a new opera house. John H. Senseman is chairman of the building committee.

"The only logical conclusion to reach is that the 'moving picture age' will be followed by the 'age of nervous degenerates.'" This is the prediction of the Peoria Journal after reviewing the class of pictures now being released and their effect upon a number of people who see them, according to the statistics of the moving picture bureau of the Chicago police department. Among the scenarios objected to are included tough concert hall scenes, the shooting of a priest, the poisoning, choking, and stabbing of a man, a burglar at work, a hold-up, a safe robbery, a poisoning, a kidnapping, an abduction, a hanging, and a fight with the police. This paper hints that probably a very small proportion of the objectionable films are sifted out by the censors.

Moving picture machine operators in Waco, Tex., will be compelled to stand an examination before a board of public safety in the future. This board is composed of the Mayor, Fire Commissioner, Fire Chief, Fire Marshall and city electrician. A charge of $2.50 will be made for issuing the permits.

The Aurora Theater, which was scheduled to be opened September 23 at 22 North River Street, Aurora, Ill., by Mrs. W. J. Mullen and Mrs. H. G. Mulvey, will be known as "The Home of the Mirror Screen." The building will have a seating capacity of 500.

The Theater Company, of St. Louis and New York, has been licensed to do business in the State of Missouri.

The canvas top over the St. Clair airdome, 13th Street and St. Clair Avenue, East St. Louis, Ill., was lifted from its supports and deposited on the heads of a hundred spectators by a windstorm, September 17. No one was injured.

C. D. Stevens, formerly city clerk of Champaign, Ill., has opened a campus for a moving picture show on Wright Street in Champaign. The operating room was built to one side of the entrance instead of directly over it, as is given in Illinois photoplay constructions. Another safeguard is an ample number of exits, two at the back, two in front and one at the side. A room at the side will be used to take care of the overflow crowds. This room is comfortably fitted with chairs and lounging seats, where patrons may rest or read until room is made for them in the main building.

William Shrader, of Sterling, Ill., has sold the Star Theater, of that city, to William T. Eagan and John Adair, who will operate under the firm name of Eagan & Adair. The name of the place has been changed to the Lyric, the building has been overhauled, repainted, decorated and new ventilating system installed. John Adair is a song writer.

The Bib Four Amusement Company, of Chicago, has been incorporated, with a capital stock of $12,000, to do a general amusement business. The incorporators are: Harry M. Rosenblum, Samuel Spitzer, Elias Mayer.

SO. BETHLEHEM, PA.

The International Amusement Company occupied the Grand Opera House Tuesday and Wednesday of last week, presenting a series of travel pictures. The program was very interesting, and the projection fairly good.

The exterior of the Pastime Theater has been renovated, and business, as usual, is good. Mr. J. G. Bellen, the manager, announces that he is booking feature films.

Mr. F. H. Stewart, a traveling representative of the Thos. A. Edison concern, was a visitor in town recently.

Jack Motsie, manager of the "Kentucky Night Riders," a film in three reels, had his show booked at the Breeze last Monday. The pictures proved to be such an attraction that he was held over three more days, playing to capacity houses.

Paul Lamero, a scenic artist, who hails from Vermont, made his appearance in town about three months ago; his first job was at the Bijou Theater, and his work proved to be so satisfactory that every theater manager in town had their places re-painted and decorated by the above named person.

On Tuesday, Sept. 19, Lyman H. Howe's travel festival was presented at the Grand Opera House before a large and enthusiastic audience. The Coronation films, which were widely advertised, were very popular.

NEWS BRIEFS.

Consul E. Haldeman Dennison states in a recent issue of the Daily Consular and Trade Reports that there are 16 moving picture shows in Dundee, Scotland; the majority are small, their admission charge being 2 to 4 cents. The best and largest syndicate operates 16 theaters in Scotland. Motion pictures of Wild West type are very popular.

BIOGRAPH.

THROUGH HIS WIFE'S PICTURE (Oct. 23).—Mr. Nelson is a "newlywed" and carries his darling wife's picture with him always. However, he almost falls for the temptation to go to the mask-ball, inviting an erstwhile lady friend to go with him, telling her that he would dress as a pirate and she to go as a Spanish gypsy. At the sight of his wife's portrait, however, he realizes his intended wrong-doing and changes his mind, asking a friend to go in his stead. The office boy mixes the letters and wifey gets the one he intended for the girl, and she goes to catch her erring hubby. So while hubby waits at home, wifey is keeping her eye on the bold, bad pirate she believes to be her husband.

THE INVENTOR'S SECRET (Oct. 23).—An old toymaker invents an automatic doll and goes to the lawyers to apply for a patent. That day a young girl is reported missing and Dan, the cop, receives word that a reward of $500 is offered for solving the mystery of her disappearance. Dan's sweetheart gets a position as cook in the inventor's family, and catching a glimpse of the doll, thinks it is the missing girl. Dan for awhile has a vision of $500, only to wake up to find both he and his sweetheart out of a job.

THE LONG ROAD (Oct. 26).—At a garden party, Edith, in a spirit of coquetry, arouses the jealousy of Ned, her fiance, who, taking her action seriously, gives a parasol, which he intended as a present for her, to another girl. This induces a quarrel, and both stubborn, the break is never mended. Hence, he marries the other girl. Heart-crushed, Edith seeks solace in the convent of a Sister of Mercy. Some time later, fate ordains it that she be assigned to embroider the layette of Ned's first baby, a task often undertaken by the Sisters. This, you may imagine, is a terrible ordeal, but there is no help for it and the task is finished, which brings about the first meeting since the day of the garden fete between the two women. Several years later, while Edith is working among the poor of the East Side, she is startled by the sound of a shot, and following a small boy into the saloon from whence the sound came, finds Ned, who, having suffered business reverses, and become a hopeless drunkard, the accidental victim of the shot, with his child, now grown to boyhood, and his wife by his side. Ned has now reached the final turn in the road.

THE SCANDAL MONGERS (Oct. 23).—Ethel Gerhart had long been jealous and envious of the popularity of Norrine Lucas, who was unselfish and winning in her ways. When the two went to the same private school their respective dispositions quickly gained the same reputations that they had at home. Finally Ethel conceived a plan to discredit Norrine. She contrived that a sum of money should be taken from a girl's room and hidden among Norrine's belongings. When it was discovered, of course, Norrine was in disgrace and was expelled. Ethel took good care that the scandal was spread at home through the agency of her mother, who was a past mistress of the art.

The truth was finally brought out by a young evangelist, who was attracted to Norrine. He preached a sermon which powerfully effected Ethel. She jumped up hysterically and declared her sinister plot. Norrine became the minister's wife.

THE TARS ASHORE (Oct. 25).—Bill Brace and Tom Splice had a day's leave to go ashore. The first thing they noticed was a poster, announcing big doings at the State Fair, so they went.

The picture shows them having all sorts of fun, one continuous round of excitement among the thousands on the midway. They gaze, open mouthed, at the dog-faced boy and the bearded lady. They admire the diving girls. They are interested in the boxing baboon. They throw baseballs at the colored can, and watch the aeroplane and the trapeze performers. They pick up a man who has been run over by an automobile: in short, they spend such a day as two jolly sailors should.

On their way back to the ship, they buy a couple of mascots, a duck and a little pig, which add to the excitement. Arriving on board, they are noisily and delightedly greeted by their mates, and with the aid of the mascots, are having a glorious time, until the first officer orders all below. The next day, alas! for the mascots. They have been roasted, and Bill and Tom are seeing who can eat the most.

A RURAL CONQUEROR (Oct. 26).—When Ira Smiley saw that he was in danger of losing his sweetheart, Marjorie Thorne, because he was not quite as well tailored as her city friends, he did not give up.

He exchanged his plow shoes for patent leathers, his felt hat for a silk one, and then he called on Marjorie.

She went driving with him, and when they were fording the river, Ira calmly got out and unhitched the horse, declaring that he would leave her there unless she promised to marry him. Marjorie consented then.

But after he carried her ashore and back home, she again rebelled and declared she would never marry him. Ira started to carry her back to the marooned buggy. Then Marjorie capitulated.

LOVE'S VICTORY (Oct. 28).—Pretty Marjorie was in love with Jack, but her father was determined that she should marry Richard Hastings, a broker. It was finally agreed that Jack should go away and get a job and not see Marjorie for sixty days. Within this period Hastings contrived to have a notice inserted in the newspapers, stating that Jack had married some one else. When Marjorie saw it, she consented to marry Hastings.

One day Hastings, Marjorie and her father went out for a ride in the automobile. The gasoline ran out on the way, and they were compelled to stop. Marjorie remained in the machine while Hastings and her father went in search of gasoline.

Now Jack had secured a job and he was at work within a few rods of where the machine had stopped. He hurried up and greeted his sweetheart. She at first refused to talk to him, but after he explained, she saw it was all a plot.

Hastings and her father were returning. A hand car stood on the railroad track nearby. "Will you marry me?" said Jack. "Yes," said Marjorie. Together they made a rush for the hand car. Before Hastings and father were aware of it, they were flying down the track. As soon as the automobile could be started, the two men followed in pursuit. At a crossing, Jack saw a minister driving along. The hand car was brought to a stop and the bewildered minister dragged aboard. Then as they flew at full speed with the automobile in pursuit, the knot was tied.

KALEM.

A PRISONER OF MEXICO (Oct. 23).—When the Mexican Revolution broke out Paul Mason's sympathies for the Insurgents led him to volunteer his services in assisting their cause. Gathering a number of adventurous young Americans, he took leave of Ethel Davis, his sweetheart, and started for Mexico.

A few days after Paul's departure Ethel meets with a peculiar accident. As she walks past the railroad yards in her San Diego home, her pet dog becomes attracted by something within an open box car, which he proceeds to investigate. Ethel follows her pet, but no sooner enters the car than the door is closed by a railroad employee, who knows nothing of what has taken place. The train is made up and starts on its journey with Ethel a prisoner within the closed box car.

Twelve hours later the train halts at a small town in the Mexican interior where Federal soldiers are quartered. In passing the train a soldier hears a cry within one of the cars. The door is opened and Ethel, weak and exhausted from her imprisonment, is lifted to the ground. She begs to be returned home, but General Alvarez explains that the Insurgents have control of the railroad line. Ethel is placed in care of the wife of the Federal jailer.

Just at this time the Insurgents' pack train starts out to carry supplies to a beseged town nearby. Paul gathers his men and escorts the train. A troop of Federals discover the party and overtake them after a sharp fight. Paul is led away a prisoner. At the jail he is recognized by Ethel, who effects his escape. The two fugitives are discovered and followed by the Federals, whose rifle shots are heard by the Insurgents. The Insurgents come to the rescue of the two Americans and put their pursuers to rout. The end of hostilities enables Paul to conduct Ethel to their American home.

THE LOST FREIGHT CAR (Oct. 25).—Jim, a young freight conductor, is in love with Nell, daughter of the yard master, who objects to the match. When Jim reports for duty he finds that his train carries a car containing a valuable consignment of silk. While the train is in transit the couplings unloosen and by a peculiar accident the train splits into three sections, each gaining speed until the valuable car of silk loses its balance, crashing over the embankment and disappearing among the trees beyond. On an up grade the sections come together and the train proceeds without the loss of the car being noticed.

A few days later, when the shippers have held the railroad responsible for the loss of the car, Jim is dismissed from the railroad's service. He applies at the local factory for employment, but is informed there is no place for him. Meeting Nell, Jim tells her that he will not rest until he has found the car and cleared himself. He therefore starts out on foot to traverse the right of way.

The president of the road comes through on a tour of inspection and invites the yard master and his daughter to accompany him over the division.

In his travels Jim discovers a burning bridge and hears the President's special coming in the distance. He succeeds in flagging the train and the crew extinguish the flames. It is necessary to secure timbers from the nearby woods to brace the bridge, and while engaged in this work the lost car is discovered hidden by broken branches. The accident is therefore explained. Jim gains the good graces of the president and, best of all, the yard master's consent to his marriage.

THE PERIL OF THE PLAINS (Oct. 27).—When Mrs. Walker, the settler's wife, prepared for the week's baking, she found the supply of flour exhausted and sent Nancy and Bob, her two children, to borrow from a neighboring cabin.

Scarcely had the children passed into the woods than a band of redskins, brandishing their guns, swept down upon them, leading them away captives.

Meanwhile another band of savages crept stealthily upon the Walker cabin, setting it on fire. Taking advantage o the smoke which filled the atmosphere, the settler and his wife hurried out of the back door, only to be followed by the Indians. Reaching a stream of water, Walker and his wife hid under the surface, breathing through reeds until the pursuing savages lost their trail.

Nancy and Bob, captives in an Indian wigwam, discovered a huge circular wicker basket. Pushing the basket to the door which faced upon a steep hill, they crept inside and started the basket bumping and tossing over the rocks. Reaching a safe place beyond the camp, they crawled from the basket and hid in an old tree.

The Walkers having reached the stockade, told the men of the missing children and two brave volunteers started in search of them. As they passed the old tree, the children hailed them and were borne safely to the stockade where, after a sharp fight, the Indians were dispersed and the Walker family happily reunited.

COALS OF FIRE (Oct. 23).—Coals of Fire treats of two men—one a big, strong, brawny fighting man, the other, a man weaker in physical vitality, but superior in his intellectual mentality. The latter, Noel Clayton, loved a girl of the old Kentucky border, but he was forced to see her carried off by her other suitor, Bill Ewing, the man of brawn. Noel saves the life of Lucy, the little sister of his loved one, and later goes away to the settlements to study law. Years afterward, Bill kills a man and is about to pay the penalty when Lucy, now grown to womanhood, appeals to Noel, the rising young lawyer, to save Bill for the sake of his former sweetheart. He returns good for evil and frees Bill, and finding in Lucy a tender and loving replica of her sister, marries her. Future years bring him fame and power and eventually he becomes governor of Missouri.

WHY THE SHERIFF IS A BACHELOR (Oct. 24).—Joe Davis, the sheriff, loves and is loved by Alice Craig. Billy Craig, her brother and the town loafer, is induced to join "Dorley's" gang, and they hold up and rob the Eagle City Bank. The sheriff leads his posse in pursuit of the bandits and after a thrilling chase, in which the riders accomplish many daredevil, risky feats of horsemanship, he dismounts and goes after Billy Craig. The bullets—real bullets—fly thick and fast. They strike the sheriff's drinking cup, stones are shattered, and a piece of a tree is shot away by Craig in his attempt to escape. The sheriff finally gets his man and is horror stricken to find in him the brother of his sweetheart.

On the return to town Alice meets the sheriff

LOST IN THE JUNGLE (Oct. 26).—Jan Kruga and his daughter Meta live on a farm in the Transvaal. The nearest neighbor, Sir John Morgan, lives 20 miles away, and it is only on rare intervals that she ever goes even that far away from her isolated home. Toddles, a work elephant on her father's farm, is her only pet and in the first part of our story we see her befriend him from a cruel keeper. Hans, a neighboring Boer farmer calls and asks for Meta's hand in marriage. The girl is ordered by her father to accept Han's attentions. She has been taught to obey and when Hans gives her a love offering, a huge necklace of beads, she meekly offers her cheek for the betrothal kiss. Sir John's nephew, Hirshal, comes for a visit from England and Sir John brings him for a friendly call on the Krugas. Meta's heart awakens at the sight of the handsome, young Englishman, and she returns Han's necklace. The father, however, orders her to marry Hans, or never darken his door again. Meta refuses, and is driven away by the heartless, old man. She starts for Sir John's house on foot, is lost in the jungle, and attacked by a leopard. She defends herself with a large hunting knife and though badly lacerated gets away.

In this condition she is found by her pet, Toddles, who has taken French leave of the farm after a severe beating. How the half-dead girl is carried back to her home by the elephant, the father's change of heart, and Hans' dismissal we prefer to leave untold.

A PAINTER'S IDYL (Oct. 27).—A large canvas is painted before the camera, and in seven successive scenes we watch this picture take form and substance, while ever before the eye is the subject of the sketch—the Yosemite in all its grandeur. The story tells of the painter's love for the modest, young schoolmistress, who passes the spot daily where he works, of the coming of a rich, young summer girl, who amuses herself with the artist, the jealousy of the schoolmistress and the final realization to both the artist and the schoolmistress of their great love.

EDISON.

A DAY AT WEST POINT MILITARY ACADEMY NEW YORK (Oct. 24).—At West Point we see the United States Army officer in the making and a knowledge of the daily routine soon removes the idea that the student officer's life is one of ease and luxury.

During the summer months the strain is particularly severe. The day usually starts with a good infantry drill, followed by the manual of arms. The corps is then divided into squads for drill in the various other branches of the service. The light artillery is perhaps the most spectacular with its galloping horses and rumbling cannon. Then follow cavalry drills, pistol and sabre practice, then the handling of the heavy coast artillery guns from range finding to firing. Rifle practice, engineering, pontoon work and bridge building contribute to keep everybody busy.

But what impresses the visitor most, is the corps on parade. Every man immaculate and all moving in unison past the reviewing officer. This was reviewed by Admiral Togo, which intensifies the interest of the film.

HOW THE TELEPHONE CAME TO TOWN (Oct. 25).—Preparations are being made by the telephone company to invade a small town where many property owners happen to be women of the antiquated type who object strenuously to the erection of unsightly poles. They draw up a formal protest and proceed to the office of the mayor, who, of course, is unable to grant their request.

The leader of the anti-telephone pole movement finds, upon her arival home, a number of workmen about to plant a pole in front of her property. With one bound she leaps into the hole to the astonishment of the nonplused workmen. A crowd soon gathers. The foreman, superintendent and a policeman make all sorts of threats, but to no avail. She holds the fort and defies them all. All wonder how it's going to end, when a bright-looking school teacher comes to the rescue and whispers something in the superintendent's ear. He sees the point and, with the policeman, leaves the seat of war. The officer soon returns with a tiny live mouse. Needless to say, the determined lady scrambles out of the hole instanter and the pole is planted triumphantly.

THE FAIRIES' BANQUET (Oct. 25).—We first see the gnomes come forth in the half light of the newly risen Moon Fairy, to make ready the banquet for the king and queen of Fairyland.

Puck, the mischievous sprite, has somehow failed to get an invitation and he proceeds to revenge himself for the seeming slight by tormenting the gnomes. They try to catch him, but he is too nimble-footed. His success makes him a little reckless, and in a daring moment they finally do capture him, only to find he has transformed himself into a white rabbit. When they think they will cook the rabbit for the banquet he suddenly becomes himself again, and laughing, eludes them.

Then comes the fairy troop and there are dances, dainty, half-seen, fairylike dances, which end when Puck, who seems possessed that the festivities are not to proceed peacefully, darts in among the revelers and upsets things again. He is gone before they realize who the disturber is.

We next see the discovery that he has hidden away the honey and overturned all the leafy plates of the banquet table. The feast is spoiled and the gnomes dash off to find the little mischief-maker. In trying to elude them in the forest he runs into the midst of the mystic circle and is caught and brought before the king. The queen pleads for mercy and Puck, won by her sweetness, kneels in loving loyalty again. Then suddenly, as the dances begin he sees afar the coming of the Dawn Fairy. It is time for all good fairies to vanish, which feat is duly accomplished before our eyes.

Then the gnomes drowsily slip away, Puck curls up under a fern and falls fast asleep, and the Dawn Fairy slowly becomes visible to us as the story ends.

AN ISLAND COMEDY (Oct. 27).—The story begins by showing the admiration of a young girl for a certain young man, an admiration which she confides to her chum. In a spirit of mischief the latter passes the information on to the aforesaid young man, not knowing that the girl's small brother is listening to the conversation. When the young man approaches his divinity, full of confidence, he finds a very cool reception awaiting him. But, being a young man of resource, he makes a bargain with the small boy. We next see the youngster landing his sister on one of the tiny little islands in the St. Lawrence and while her attention is directed to its beautiful scenery, he pushes off his boat and leaves her there alone. By a most singular coincidence, just then the young man lands on the other side of the island. And then to carry the joke a little further, the boy steals his boat.

As the hours pass, and the young lady's hunger grows apace, she begins to wish that she could speak to the young man, especially as he carries a knapsack, which might contain luncheon, but she holds out gravely until he brings forth the luncheon right before her eyes. Then she surrenders.

THE KID FROM THE KLONDIKE (Oct. 28).—"Kid" Bolton, having made a stake of about fifty thousand dollars in the Klondike, decides to go back to the States and is given a rousing send-off by the boys.

In Seattle he purchases new clothes, a silk hat and jewelry, and manages to become acquainted with a pretty stenographer, Ollie, at the hotel. He falls in love with her and shortly afterward proposes, only to be rejected. But he bobs up serenely and proposes again, this time dictating his proposal to Ollie, who writes it for him and charges him a twenty-five cent fee. Upon receiving this unique offer, she decides to accept him, but only on condition that he obtains her father's consent. This is quite satisfactory to the "Kid," and he starts for Chicago to visit his future father-in-law. On the train he confides to a fellow passenger that he has made a fortune in the Klondike, whereupon the stranger decides to try to get some easy money from him. He invites him to a dinner, where he introduces him to two young women, his confederates, to whom he conveys the news that he has found an easy mark by telegraphing with a knife on a glass of water. The "Kid," however, thoroughly familiar with telegraphy, gets the message also and is warned that he is among sharpers.

Arriving in Chicago, he writes Ollie's father that he would like to see him. The next day his train acquaintances arrive in an auto to take him out and show him the town. He leaves all his money and valuables with the clerk and joins them, riding out to a roadhouse, where they have a sumptuous dinner. When the bill is presented, his friend asks the "Kid" to pay, but he has no money, and the proprietor orders them both thrown out of the place.

Next day at his hotel, the "Kid" receives Ollie's father, but when they come face to face, he finds that he is none other than the proprietor of the roadhouse. Naturally he will not have such a man as the "Kid" must be for a son-in-law, and rushes out in a rage.

But the "Kid" refuses to be beaten and taking his friend, the grafter, with him, decides to beard the lion in his den. He finds Ollie's father dining tete-a-tete with the two girls and by threatening to tell his daughter he soon obtains his written consent to marry Ollie. Ollie arrives and the wedding bells ring out.

THREE OF A KIND (Oct. 21).—Seeing two exceedingly attractive girls playing croquet with their father, the three make up their minds that the girls need young male escorts, and each tries to outdo the other in forcing an introduction. Unfortunately, the father is not at all disposed to welcome any addition to his party and, to say the least, receives the young men coldly. The girls, however, are more willing, and put it in the way of the young men to learn that they propose a trip through the Garden of the Gods. The three young men get ahead of the party and proceed to hire all the available burros, thus forcing the father to at least meet them on halfway friendly terms. We then follow the party through some of the most magnificent scenery in the world, finally reaching Steamboat Rock, from which are seen, through a telescope, the curious formations of rock which have been classified respectively as "the kissing couple," "the seal and the bear," "the lion," "the buffalo," and "the Scotchman." During this trip father, whose burro is particularly obstinate, gets very far behind and reaches Steamboat Rock after the rest of the party has left. In anger he starts to follow them home, but in crossing a stream his small animal absolutely refuses to be guided and the old gentleman is precipitated, with a very bad fall, into the bottom of the brook. In the meantime the party has arrived home, and it occurs to each one of the young men individually, that it would be a very nice thing to present one of the girls with a small burro. Thus they dash off separately, each bringing back one of the little animals, hardly larger than a good sized dog. As the gifts are being presented with due ceremony, father appears, very hot, his clothing very much in disorder and extremely angry. The young men are immediately ordered about their business and the girls taken into the house. The picture closes with a view of the three young men looking at each other in consternation and, as a totally unexpected transformation, fades into a view of three small burros.

VITAGRAPH.

WIG WAG (Oct. 24).—Willie Van Duyn's father and mother are so solicitous about him that they cannot bear to have him out of their sight or the care of his governess. Willie is a real boy, however, and has natural inclination for all kinds of sports.

Mr. and Mrs. Van Duyn take their boy to the country, and while they are there, he goes down to the shore of the lake, where he sees an empty boat. He jumps in, pushes out from the shore, just as his father and mother rush down to the edge of the dock, trying to induce him to come back. He accidentally overturns it and only saves himself from being immediately drowned by clinging to its side. A company of "Boy Scouts" see the accident, and immediately give the "wig-wag" flag signal to some of the boys, who are out foraging. They go to Willie's rescue and bring him safely to shore.

As soon as Willie has fully recovered, he pleads with his father to let him become a member of the "Boy Scouts." Finally Mr. Van Duyn consents. When the Van Duyn's visit the camp to see how their son is getting along, they are astonished to find that he is a rugged, manly and popular fellow with his associates, and no longer a matter of anxiety and solicitude to them, thoroughly capable of taking care of himself.

AUNT HULDA, THE MATCHMAKER (Oct. 25).—Colonel Fairfax, a Southern gentleman, in straightened circumstances, after the war, lives with his only daughter, Leslie, and sees the estates of the old families bought up by the newly rich. Hawley Caldwell, a young Southerner, is in love with Leslie, and their love affair is of great interest to Aunt Hulda, who has been Leslie's nurse in slavery days, and is now "general factotum" of the Fairfax family.

Hawley is introduced to Pearl Winslow, the daughter of a wealthy Northern manufacturer, who has bought an estate near by. She falls in love with him and flirts with him. Tales of this, very much exaggerated, are carried to Leslie. She becomes jealous and there is a breach between the lovers, and circumstances help to make matters worse.

Aunt Hulda is very much worried, and when, one night, after a ball, at which the lovers have become more estranged than ever, she hears her mistress sobbing, she resolves to take a-hold and clear things up. She visits Hawley and tells him that he is a fool to mind Leslie's manner, for she really loves him.

He doubts this. She bids him prove it and tells him what to do. He gets up a fake run-a-way and is thrown from his horse. While he is lying in apparent unconsciousness, Leslie reveals her heart and a reconciliation takes place. As the two happy lovers sit in the parlor, the old mammy sits by her kitchen fire and chuckles over the success of her scheme.

REGENERATION (Oct. 28).—Hunter Ross deserts his wife and child and she is driven to the extremes of poverty, being obliged to sell pencils to keep the spark of life in herself and little one. Fearing the worst, she writes a note, saying:—"I am the wife of Hunter Ross, and this is our child," pinning the note on the child's dress in the hope that some one will find and care for the little girl, in case anything should happen to herself.

Ross, who is a man of means, gives himself up to all sorts of dissipations, becoming infatuated with a very fascinating woman, with whom he spends his time and upon whom he lavishes his money. While dining in a restaurant, they quarrel, and in a frenzy, strikes the woman. She rushes out into the park and along the riverside. Suddenly she is attracted by the prostrate form of a woman, over whom is bending a little child. Rushing to the side of the still form she discovers that the poor woman is dead. With a maternal instinct, the distracted woman takes the child to her home. She finds the note pinned to the child's dress.

A week later Hunter Ross calls on the woman. She shows him the evidence of the child's identity. He tells her that she is not fit to keep his child and takes his daughter from her. The woman is aroused to a realization of her dishonor, but determinedly holds to her purpose to regain her self respect by seeking employment and placing herself in a self supporting position.

Shortly afterward, she meets the man who has spurned her. They both recognize a decided change in the other, brought about by the influence of the child, and he makes the woman his wife. In their regeneration, the rest of their lives is spent in a consciousness of doing the right thing for the child and themselves.

THE FOOLISHNESS OF JEALOUSY (Oct. 23).—Mrs. Dickson thinks her husband is too attentive to his stenographer, Miss Lou West, who is very much in love with Lou Carson, Mr. Dickson's friend. Carson has been very persistent in his attentions to Miss West, but unsuccessful in gaining her consent to become his wife. He confides in Dickson and asks him to assist him in his suit.

Mrs. Dickson is very much astonished to see in a newspaper a picture of Miss "Lou" West, described as a most beautiful typewriter in the employ of the Atlas Millinery House, of which Mr. Dickson is the head. After Dickson succeeds in bringing about an engagement between Miss West and Lou Carson, they arrange to get married. Carson sends his friend Dickson a note, saying he will meet him at the train, signing himself "Lou." Mr. Dickson is to make a business trip and Mr. Carson and his bride would like to have his company part of the way on their honeymoon, as they are all going in the same direction.

Mrs. Dickson, after her husband has left on the trip, finds the note signed "Lou," and comes to the conclusion that it is from Miss West. She decides to feign suicide. Accordingly, she gets into bed and sends her husband a telegram to return at once. He sees through his wife's scheme, and telephones Lou Carson and his wife to come to the house at once. Dickson points to his wife's prostrate form and says, "Thank God she's gone. At last I am free." Mrs. Dickson can hardly lie still. Then her husband turns around to Mrs. Dickson's maid, chucks her under the chin and gives her a tight squeeze. This is too much for his wife, who jumps out of bed and goes for him, tooth and nail. He is so convulsed with laughter that he can hardly recover himself. When he does he tells her all about the foolishness of her jealousy and introduces her to "Lou" Carson and his wife, nee "Lou" West. Joy takes the place of gloom and Mrs. Dickson presents her best wishes and congratulations to the newly wedded pair, with apologies to her husband.

KITTY AND THE COWBOYS (Oct. 27).—Life on the ranch has a heap of fun attached to it and where they can get hold of a good-natured butt like "Fatty" they are always happy and they keep him guessing and make him the subject of their pranks. "Fatty" stands their joshing and kidding without complaint and generally with a smile, but notwithstanding his seeming good nature, he is looking for a chance to get back at them. He and his friend "Pink" arrange a scheme by framing up a letter from the County Court, calling "Fatty" for jury duty and at the same time they get the telegraph operator to send him a telegram saying his sister will arrive from the East the next day. "Fatty" shows these communications to the bunch and they at once begin to make overtures to him for an introduction to his sister when she arrives and express a desire to be made her especial custodian. "Fatty" delegates "Pink" to receive her and introduce her to the boys, during his absence at the County Seat at the hour of her arrival. "Pink" hitches up the old sorrel and starts for the railroad station, a long distance from the ranch. On the way, he meets "Fatty" at an abandoned shack, where "Fatty" makes up in wig and female attire: "a thing of beauty and a joy forever." I don't think.

"Fatty's" sister arrives at the ranch. The punchers are not accustomed to female society, and while they are somewhat puzzled by her size and remarkable features, they show her the deference due the fair sex. She makes herself agreeable and reaches their hearts by way of their stomachs, cooking a meal fit for the gods and baking biscuits "just like mother used to make." All of the boys make offers of marriage to her. She tells them she must have a separate interview with each of them, in the presence of "Pink." Each of the boys enter the kitchen separately, where she and "Pink" take their guns from them and soon have them tied together hands and feet, like a string of sausages. They manage to get loose after a while and go in search of their enchantress, finding her sound asleep in an adjoining room. They call her to account for her conduct and while they are making their complaints she takes off her dress and wig and stands before them, their old pal "Fatty," whom they carry out bodily for a ducking in the horse trough.

ECLIPSE.

A WOMAN'S SLAVE (Oct. 25).—The fearful experience of a youth who falls into the meshes of a vampire's net to enrich the unwary.

When he is finally within her clutches, she wrings from him all that he can earn and even drives him to take that which does not belong to him in order to supply her with jewels for her adornment.

Through his mother's love and the charity of a humane jeweler, he is freed from the spell cast upon him by the "woman who does not care."

GAUMONT.

JIMMIE IN LOVE (Oct. 24).—He becomes desperately enamored of his sister's music teacher and knowing that she would consider a proposal from him in the light of a joke, he disguises himself with a mustache, pretending to be a man, pays ardent court to her.

He is very successful in his suit until he accidentally removes his mustache and discloses his identity.

Jimmie proves himself full of resource in every phase of his flirtation.

MELIES.

A GYPSY BRIDE (Oct. 26).—Lola refused to marry Jean, son of the Gypsy king, and sought consolement in the woods each day. On one of these occasions, her tears were interrupted by the sudden moans of Frank Hathaway, a young American, who had fallen from his horse. Lola assisted him to the Gypsy camp, where his wounds were dressed and his horse's faulty shoes mended.

It was love at first sight for Lola and Frank and they made a habit of meeting in their Sylvan retreat every day. Jean, once more pressed his suit, and, upon being refused, cowardly attacked Lola. Frank heard the screams and rushed to the Gypsy girl's assistance. After thrashing Jean, he declared his love for the girl and suggested that they marry in order that she might leave the camp where she was so persecuted.

Frank took the girl home to his father, but that proud, haughty gentleman was sadly disappointed in his son's choice and vowed he would disown the boy if he married Lola.

Frank let love take its course and soon gained employment on a ranch. Not long after becoming the happy father of a bouncing baby, Frank is taken ill and his father is sent for. The old gentleman, not yet having forgiven his son, still refuses to come. When, however, he hears of the Stork's arrival, things take on a new aspect. The express is not fast enough to carry him to his grandson, and the child, all unwittingly, brings reconciliation and happiness once more to the estranged father and son, with the final recognition of "the Gypsy bride."

ESSANAY.

THE TRICKED TRICKSTER (Oct. 24).—Bink's wife will not allow him to smoke his pipe in the house and Binks, in a huff, goes to the club, where he begs his cronies to help him devise some plan of revenge against his overbearing spouse. A message is therefore sent, which tells the wife that her husband has been blown up in an explosion. The boys then plan a shock for Binks and a fake telegram, supposedly coming from Mrs. Binks, is handed him. It reads: "Bury Binks as cheaply as possible, will marry the ice-man." This cures Binks and Mrs. Bink's shock has been sufficient to allow him a few privileges in the house.

THE FAMILY PET'S REVENGE (Oct. 24).—Mr. and Mrs. Bobbitt go to the theater, leaving "Dooley" at home. "Dooley" makes a wreck of the house during their absence for being left behind. "Dooley" is an exceedingly canine comedian.

ATHLETICS (Philadelphia Americans) vs. GIANTS (New York Nationals) in the WORLD'S CHAMPIONSHIP BASEBALL SERIES OF 1911 (Oct. 25).—This is the fourth consecutive world series film to be made by the Essanay Film Manufacturing Company, of Chicago. It pictures important events at the games played in New York and Philadelphia, in the struggle between the winners of the American and National league pennants for the world's series trophy.

TOO MANY ENGAGEMENTS (Oct. 26).—Bob Crandall, a young stock market plunger, receives word from his brokers that a wheat deal has cleared him $10,000. Wishing to celebrate his good fortune, Bob writes Grace, a girl friend, asking her to take dinner with him that evening at the Charles Hotel. Grace is on the point of accepting, when a telegram arrives informing her of the illness of a dear girl friend out of town and asking her to come at once. Grace 'phones Bob that she cannot keep the engagement with him, and prepares to catch the next train. Bob is downcast until he thinks of Rose, another girl, calls her and finds her very willing to dine with him. In the small private dining room at the hotel that evening, Bob and Rose are enjoying themselves, when Bob's valet brings him a telegram from Grace, stating her friend's illness was not serious, and that she will come direct to the hotel from the depot to keep her engagement. With two girls on his hands, Bob is stumped. Excusing himself to Rose, he hikes to the lobby where he secures the help of a bell-boy to assist him in entertaining both girls without either suspecting. Grace arrives and Bob conducts her to the adjoining private dining room. Their dinner is nicely started when the boy summons Bob to the "lobby." Instead, Bob hustles in to Rose, and so it starts, Bob hustling from one room to another at the summons of the bell-boy and managing to keep the girls from suspecting. He finally gets Grace into a taxi and returns to Rose. But Grace has left her purse, returns for it and meets Bob and Rose in the hotel entrance. Result—Bob is accused of being a deep-dyed scoundrel and is deserted by both girls, leaving him to collapse on the sidewalk as he gazes woefully after them and thinks of two miserably spoiled dinners and good money spent for nothing.

PALS (Oct. 27).—Fred and Jack have been pals since boyhood and as luck would have it, they both go to the same college. Here both boys become strong factors in the success of the college eleven, and their many games together, both fighting for the honor of their alma mater, serves to bind the tie of friendship stronger. Until Fred falls in love with Marion does a seeming barrier arise. Marion and Jack are friends, and for the first time Jack evinces his one fault—a deep, poignant jealousy. It is nearing Fred's birthday and Marion and Jack, in planning a little surprise for Fred, are often together and this excites Fred almost to the point of hatred for his life-time friend. In a hot argument he strikes Jack on the jaw, knocking him unconscious. The other boys hurriedly send for a doctor and Fred sulks off into another room. Here he falls asleep and dreams he has killed his friend. When he awakens and finds Jack still unconscious, he believes that the dream was a reality. He then plans to leave, but Jack arouses and then explains that his "affair" with Mildred is innocent enough. The two friends then shake hands and Fred promises never to be jealous of his pal again.

THE FORESTER'S PLEA (Oct. 28).—Henry Carter, a forester, has but one failing—that of drink. Despite his efforts to cure himself of his terrible habit, temptation is always stronger than his will, and Agnes, his daughter, is in despair. Finally persuaded to take treatment at a sanitarium by Rev. Small, Carter decides to give it a trial. He returns in the fall, cured. A month later, Carter is passing Jake Easton's saloon, when two or three of his former cronies invite him to have a drink. He refuses, and the boys, under Easton's orders, drag him into the saloon and force him to drink. The old craving returns and Carter returns home that night again intoxicated. The next morning he determines to have revenge against Easton, seeks him out and in a fight he accidentally kills Easton with the latter's own weapon. Returning to his cabin, Carter tells his daughter and Reverend Small what he has done, and Small, desiring to make it appear that Easton has been shot in self-defense, slightly wounds the forester and when the trial comes up later, Carter is discharged.

PATHE.

A REVOLUTION IN THE BACHELORS' CLUB (Oct. 25).—Great excitement prevails in the club room over the question of woman's suffrage and the boys all agree that never in all their mortal lives will they have anything to do with any woman. One particularly vehement denouncer of the fair sex hies him home about 1:30 A. M. to his apartment house, where only bachelors live and by a strange accident crawls into the wrong apartment. It seems that in the meantime a beautiful woman has moved into this apartment, and hearing the intruder enter and believing it to be a burglar, she hides under the bed. Here she is discovered by the bachelor, who thinks it's a suffragette burglar, and rushes off to the club and later to the police station, with the whole club at his heels. They go with two officers to arrest the intruder, only to discover that Mr. Bachelor had been in somebody else's quarters. The whole thing results in a revolution in the Bachelors' Club too funny for words.

IN FRONTIER DAYS (Oct. 26).—A wild story of life on the plains in the days when the early settlers were going over the land in caravans. A scout far in advance of his company sees the Indians take the warpath, and riding post haste he warns his company of the impending danger. Hastily breaking camp they climb into their wagons and start on a wild reckless dash for liberty over the rolling prairies. One member of the band, however, rides on a course by himself pursued by two blood-thirsty redskins on horses almost as good as his own. Ultimately this man reaches a ranch and securing the services of another man rides to the rescue of his now besieged company, which is making a desperate stand. All ends happily when the Indians are finally routed.

MOTHER IS STRONG ON HYPNOTISM (Oct. 27).—Son-in-law seems to have a will of his own, so has wife's mother, and between the two they manage to keep the house in a perfect uproar. Finally mother surreptitiously takes a few lessons in hypnotism, and from that moment Hubby's troubles commence—so do the troubles of a good many other people and ultimately mother herself gets in wrong. The indignities and the work that poor Hubby has to undergo under the malignant influence of his mother-in-law gone wild on hypnotism, are too funny for description.

SAVED BY THE FLAG (Oct. 28).—In Mexico a lieutenant in the United States Army on leave meets a beautiful young girl, who is a particular friend of a Mexican general. By his winning ways he soon succeeds in gaining the young lady's affection much to the chagrin of the general. Later he still further provokes the enmity of the Mexican general by compelling him to apologize for an insult to the American flag. Having fallen deeply in love with the young lady he so recently met, the lieutenant resigns from the army and takes up business in Mexico. Having done so the Mexican general is constantly on the alert for an opportunity to revenge himself, and finally on a trumped up charge he sends a file of soldiers to arrest the American, who warned of their coming, mounts his horse with his bride and in a terrific ride makes for the frontier. The soldiers pursue him hotly, but when almost in the clutches of the Mexicans the American and his young wife dash across the frontier and tearing the American flag from the staff at the Custom House, wrap themselves in it and defy the representatives of Mexico.

PATHE'S WEEKLY No. 42 (Oct. 17).—Stettin, Germany.—The Emperor and Empress of Germany officially receive the King and Queen of Spain.

THE TRAITOR (Oct. 23).—In Corsica love runs at fever heat, which accounts for the fact that Peppino is in love with another man's wife and that he is roused to jealous anger when the woman's rightful husband showers caresses upon her. She has repulsed Peppino many times, until he decides to get rid of the stumbling block in the person of her husband. He brings about a quarrel between the husband and another friend, which results in the husband's death. Then the wife, promising to marry the one who will avenge her husband, Peppino betrays the murderer and comes to claim his reward. Horror struck at his perfidy, however, the woman fails to keep her promise and Peppino is trying to force his attentions upon her, when the husband, who is supposed to be dead upon the bed in the corner, comes to life and Peppino suffers his just punishment.

IMP.

A BITING BUSINESS (Oct. 23).—Felix Hardin is a hard-working old man employed as a bookkeeper in a large concern. He has a large family and is wrapped up in his wife and children. He longs to take them out of the heat of the city to enjoy the balmy air of the country. The occasion presents itself.

Clifton, a dealer in real estate, visits the office where he is working and calls his attention to a glowing advertisement, offering bungalow lots very cheap. Hardin is not a business man and is very gullible. He looks at the plan of the lots and is infatuated with the ideas of owning one. The payments are easy and he is persuaded to part with the contents of his pay envelope as a first instalment. He returns home and gleefully explains the deal to his wife. She does not share in his enthusiasm, as there are bills to meet, and she had counted on his weekly salary to pay them. She is mollified, however, when she sees the glowing press matter and the plat of the lot.

When summer comes Hardin has a vacation and he packs his family off to the shore to feast their eyes on the lot. He finds it with some difficulty and learns that he has been the victim of a cruel swindle, the lot being situated in a mosquito infested swamp, in an isolated spot. All the members of the family give vent to their feelings in tears. Hardin crumples up the deed for the lot and casts it into the bog and the family walk away downhearted.

Montgomery, a wealthy real estate dealer, has built a bungalow near the site of Hardin's lot, and comes down with his wife for the summer. The mosquitoes make life miserable for them and he investigates. In order to rid himself of the pests Montgomery is informed the swamp must be drained and filled and he decides to purchase the property and stop the breeding of the insects. Clifton calls upon him and they walk out to inspect the swamp.

Hardin overhears the conversation and then steals away and fishes out the deed to his lot. He is approached by the sharks and holds out for an exorbitant sum for his purchase and gets it to his joy. A case of the biter being stung good and hard. (Copyrighted 1911 by the Independent Moving Picture Company of America.)

THE WAIF (Oct. 26).—Alice is the only child of Mr. and Mrs. Jason Meredith, who reside on a farm. The girl is a handsome young woman and is loved by Anson Russell. He is looked upon as a ne'er do well by her father, who discovers them enjoying a stolen meeting. The father upbraids the daughter and the result is a clandestine marriage.

Meredith is furious and drives Alice and her husband from his house, forbidding them to return. He wishes to obliterate all memories of his disobedient daughter and dashes her picture to the floor. Mrs. Meredith—a kind and motherly woman— loves the daughter, but is cowed by the irascible husband. She picks up the photograph of Alice and places it in the garret without the knowledge of her husband. She visits the garret often and weeps, kissing the picture and other little mementoes of the daughter that are near and dear to her.

RATES ON APPLICATION

Moving Picture World
125 East 23rd Street N. Y. City

The years pass and Alice writes that Anson is dead and she is left alone in the world, poor, and with a boy to support. The mother tries to secretly send her money, but is detected in the act by the father and the letter is destroyed. He forbids her to have any communication with the daughter.

The young mother is stricken by illness and dies, leaving the son, Elmer, a waif on the streets, uncared for and neglected. He ekes out an existence by selling papers. One day he is picked up by an officer and sent to a fresh air farm which is located near the Meridith farm. At the institution he is made welcome and the boy grows stronger. At his delight at escaping from the congested city, he wanders into the orchard of his grandfather and the old man, a child hater—injures him by throwing a stone. He is found suffering by his grandmother and carried to the garret of the farmhouse, where she attends to his hurt and leaves him. The boy's curiosity is aroused and in searching about the garret, he finds the picture of his mother and recognizes the portrait with astonishment. Placing it inside his shirt, he descends the stairway and walks out into the barnyard, where he falls asleep on a bench.

His grandfather approaches and sees the little poacher and is indignant. Grabbing the boy, he shakes him violently and the picture of his daughter, the child's mother, falls to the ground. The irate old man picks it up and demands an explanation. The boy, not understanding the treatment, replies that it is the picture of his mother. The kind old grandmother is drawn to the scene and hears the declaration. She clasps the boy in her arms. The heart of the obdurate old man is melted and the couple are overjoyed to find their grandson. (Copyrighted 1911 by Independent Moving Pictures Company of America.)

RELIANCE.

THE TRAPPER'S DAUGHTER (Oct. 18).—Gordon is a trapper, living in the wilds of the forest with his beautiful daughter. A young forester courts the girl, but is driven away by the father. The lovers meet clandestinely, and the girl declines to marry the man until he shall have secured her father's consent. He departs angrily, and meeting the father demands a reason for his objects to the marriage. A heated altercation takes place, ending in a physical conflict. Gordon draws a long knife, and in the scuffle the point is turned against him and he falls unconscious. His adversary runs back to the hut and begs the girl to elope with him, and she is about to acquiesce when she notices the bloodstains on his shirt. She soon forces a confession from him, and, to his amazement, grabs his pistol and compels him to lead her to her father. A youth assists them in carrying the still form back to the hut, and holding her sweetheart at bay she sends the boy for the sheriff. She is overjoyed to find that her father still lives, and revives him. After the trapper has recovered he manfully admits he was at fault, and gives his consent to their marriage.

DIVORCE (Oct. 21).—Tiring of family discord, George Evans takes his boy, Jack, and goes away, leaving the baby girl, Hazel, with its mother. She secures a divorce and marries a man named Harris. Evans goes to the Australian gold fields, placing Jack in the hands of the Browns. No word being received from the father, the Browns adopt Jack and he grows to manhood. While at a summer resort in the East he saves his sister from drowning. Ignorant of their relationship, the young people fall in love and a brilliant wedding takes place. Evans returns, traces his son and arrives as the ceremony is concluded.

AMBROSIO.

TWEEDLEDUM'S MONKEY (Oct. 14).—Tweedledum wins a monkey at a bazaar and takes his pet home. The brute is acrobatic in its tendencies, for it amuses itself in running up house walls, entering windows, breaking crockery, etc., etc., dragging poor Tweedledum behind it. He finally gets it home, and after his house has been completely wrecked he is forced to destroy the animal.

TWEEDLEDUM AND ONE OF HIS TRICKS (Oct. 14).—Tweedledum wears his sister's new slit-skirt, and with a handsome wig and beautiful hat causes a stir on the boulevard. His many admirers follow him around from place to place and even invade his parlor when he gets home. His sister puts them to rout with a stout broom and she and Tweedledum enjoy a hearty laugh over the joke.

THE TEMPTATIONS OF ST. ANTHONY (Oct. 18).—Anthony is shown as a Patrician, feasting and drinking, surrounded by slaves and beautiful women. His favorite proves unfaithful and Anthony is about to slay his rival when his hand is stayed by a Christian priest. Anthony is converted relinquishing a life of luxury and giving to the poor his silken raiment and costly jewels. As a holy hermit he retires to a cave, and the Evil One tries to tempt him back to his former life. Hideous, grinning devils crawl about him and are instantly transformed into women of wondrous beauty. Anthony withstands the temptations and goes out and preaches to the multitudes. The woman tries to ensnare him again, but his eloquent appeal to heaven to save her soul moves her to reformation. Her death while clasping the cross is compellingly acted and touching.

BISON.

A WESTERN BRIDE (Oct. 17).—Unable to stand her husband's drinking habits and abuse, Mrs. Allen is forced to leave him. The sheriff gives her shelter, and the next day her child is born. The sheriff celebrates the arrival of the little stranger at his home in typical Western fashion. A week later Mrs. Allen dies, her husband watching her last moments through the window. He leaves the locality and eventually becomes a bandit. The sheriff adopts the motherless babe and she grows to womanhood, protected and beloved by the hardy men of the camp. Her wedding is made a big celebration, and Allen, returning, sees the guests and follows them, planning to hold them up. He is led to the same window through which he saw his wife die, and realizes that the girl is his own child. Overcome with remorse and regret of his misspent life, he staggers away vowing to thereafter follow the path of honesty.

A WARRIOR'S TREACHERY (Oct. 20).—As the hunting party is leaving, White Swan bids Big Deer an affectionate farewell. Thunder Cloud is furiously jealous, but conceals his emotion.

He lags behind, and as the canoes wind down the stream he turns back, hurries to the village, ties White Swan's hands and compels her to accompany him. When Big Deer returns home he takes the trail and locates Thunder Cloud's camp fire. A thrilling fight takes place, in which White Swan helps her lover overpower Thunder Cloud, and the reunited couple float down the stream, the girl tenderly bathing the wounds of her red knight.

REX.

HER SISTER (Oct. 19).—Dorothy Blake, like four or five others before her, tires of the country. She determines to go to the city—and does so. She comes to the city, with its lights and its darkness, and secures work in an office. Enter Cupid. Her employer has eyes that see; he observes that she is graceful, notes she is pretty, realizes she is "different," and discovers that he loves her. And the country girl with her sweet simplicity and simple sweetness, gives to him the greatest gift of humans, the fire and faith of a first love.

She goes home to the farm on her vacation, and tells of the ways and wonders of the city. And her younger sister opens wide eyes, and wonders, and wanders, in her turn, to the town.

A change comes over the man, and the woman's intuition is quick to notice it. Many bills come to the office for flowers delivered to Dolly Pelham, a dancer at one of the theaters, and Dorothy realizes that he has become infatuated with the actress. One night she follows him to the theater and sees him applauding—her sister on the stage. Dazed, she goes to the dressing-room, and learns of her sister's arrival in town and her success on the stage. They talk, and the little actress hears, and learns, and decides. The next week she leaves town.

Dorothy and the man who had been but a man marry. A year later they visit the old people on the farm. At the time the younger sister is home for a rest. He is presented to her, starts, stares, understands, and wonders at the strangeness of a world.

THANHOUSER.

LITTLE EM'LY AND DAVID COPPERFIELD (Oct. 24).—This picture shows David already grown to manhood at an inn at Yarmouth. Here he meets Steerforth, a chum of his boyhood days, at the Salem House. David invites Steerforth to come with him to visit his friends at Yarmouth. They arrive just when the announcement is made of the engagement of little Em'ly to Ham. David is enthusiastic and congratulates the seemingly happy couple. He then introduces Steerforth, who is attracted by little Em'ly's simple beauty. At the first opportunity he makes love to her. Little Em'ly sees in the suave Steerforth her ideal and eventually he is able to induce the misguided girl to elope with him to Italy. Before leaving she sends a note to Ham, which wrings the heart of her faithful lover.

In Italy, the caddish Steerforth tires of Em'ly and deserts her. Little Em'ly then finds herself adrift.

Later, after a long illness, broken in spirit and mind, she arrives in London, where Mr. Peggotty and David find her and provide for her future.

In the meantime Steerforth sails for England. The boat in which he sails is wrecked off the coast of Yarmouth. Ham sights the wreck and in an attempted rescue is drowned. Steerforth's body is washed ashore. Whimsical fate brings the bodies of Steerforth and Ham side by side. The last scene closes with David, hat in hand and bowed head, standing between the bodies of two of his friends.

THE JEWELS OF ALLAH (Oct. 27).—A mosque in the desert, where Arabs worship, is looted by a band of the Foreign Legion and the jewels stolen by the officer in command, a reckless French count. A Sheik, unable to save the gems, vows to devote his life to recovering them, and patiently tracks the Count over land and sea to England.

The Count meets an American girl, whose father has millions, and makes desperate love to her. The girl has a faithful suitor, a young American, but the dazzle of the title wins her, and she agrees to marry the man who has a romantic career and an established title.

Through one of his faithful allies the Sheik learns of the engagement, and sets off for the summer home of the millionaire. He spies about the house, and looks into the window in time to see the Count gravely investing his fiancee with his "family jewels," which are really the loot of the Arabian temple.

The Sheik determines to recover by force the gems that were stolen by violence. At night, when all in the house have retired, he forces a way in. But he is just a trifle too late. For the girl, afraid to keep such valuables in her own room, steals down stairs and places them in her father's safe. Just as she swings the door shut, the Sheik enters and overpowers her. He binds and gags the girl, and while she sits helpless in the room, he works to open the safe.

The girl frees herself of the gag, but is afraid to scream for help, as the dangerous looking Arab, with his sharp knife, is only a few feet away. But the telephone is near her, and while the attention of the intruder is distracted, she takes the receiver from the hook with her teeth (her hands being still bound) and softly calls up the man she knows she can rely upon in an emergency, her American admirer.

That young man, seated gloomily in his library, hears the call and is prompt in responding. He does not wait to get other help, he only realizes that the girl he loves is in danger, and he hastens to her side. The Sheik puts up a good battle, but is speedily overpowered. Then explanations are demanded.

The man from the desert explains his mission. He convinces them that he is not a criminal, but a victim of injustice. The Count does not deny his guilt, but tries to justify himself. The girl listens to him in silence then turns the jewels over to the Arab, saying that she does not want the jewels of a thief, nor will she marry one.

The Arab, full of joy, returns to his desert. The Count presumably goes back to France, while the young couple are happy ever after.

SOLAX.

A CORNER IN CRIMINALS (Oct. 18).—Chief of Police Ketcham Swift, hears that Slinky Sam, an escaped convict, is in town. He tells this to Willet Print, police reporter of the "Morning Wheeze." The reporter suggests a plan to capture the convict. The scheme looks good to the Chief. The next edition of the "Morning Wheeze" contains a big article stating that Slinky Sam has been found innocent and that a full pardon and a cash compensation will be given him when he is found. The next day all the bums in the city present themselves to the Chief of Police, each claiming to be Slinky Sam. The reporter loses his job, and while going down the street, is "panhandled" by a bum. Being in an angry mood, he sails into the bum and hands him a good licking. The bum's shirt is torn and the reporter recognizes a tattoo mark, which is one of the identification points of Slinky Sam. He hustles the bum to the police station and the Chief is so pleased that he hastens to have Willet Print restored to his place on the paper.

A LOVER'S RUSE (Oct. 18).—Mrs. Bougow has the rheumatism and she calls her daughters to dress her, but they see their lovers and leave their mother half dressed. Mrs. Bougow finds the four making love, and orders the boys to leave and not come back. Jack gets an idea of how to win the old lady's consent to her daughters marrying him and Frank. When Mrs. Bougow goes for a walk she is assailed by a tramp and Jack comes to her rescue. Soon after she is attacked by a big bear, but once more Jack saves her by killing the bear. Frank gets out of the bear skin and soon overtakes Jack and Mrs. Bougow and all three return to her home, where she gives her blessing to the four lovers.

HIS BETTER SELF (Oct. 20).—Ethel, the beautiful daughter of Colonel Dunn, is in love with Captain Field. Her friend, Margaret Maney, is visiting her and is much interested in the Colonel's son, Dick. The Colonel recommends Capt. Field for an important mission, and Dick, who wished it for himself, becomes enraged to such an extent that he insults Capt. Field at the club and starts a row, for which the Colonel holds Capt. Field responsible and places him under arrest. The Colonel then changes his recommendations and puts his in son's name instead.

Ethel refuses to believe that her lover is guilty and manages to bring him to the house. He refuses, however, to disclose the name of the real offender. At this point Dick's better self comes to the surface, and he sets Capt. Field right with the Colonel.

A WORD IN SEASON TO EXHIBITORS

The New Feature Film, consisting of two or more reels, goes much better with a lecture. The sound of a pleasing and trained human voice is doubly welcome when it helps your patrons to understand better and to enjoy more. In some places the lecture will be a novelty. The feature film, being a novelty too, needs both introduction and explanation and the lecture will supply both very acceptably. Wherever tried the lecture has been found a ready means of attracting the best class of patrons and putting more money into the box office. I supply—without extra charge—advertising copy for the press or for special folders, telling all about your feature film and the popularity of the lecture. It makes good advertising. Below is a list of feature films, on which I lecture or for which I will supply printed lectures at reasonable rates:

"The Passion Play" (Pathe) in 3, 4 and 5 reels.
"The Inferno of Dante" (Milano Films), 5 reels.
"The Crusaders or Jerusalem Delivered" (World's Best Film Co.), 4 reels.
"The Two Orphans" (Selig), 3 reels.
"Foul Play" (Edison), 3 reels (full lecture printed in Moving Picture World).
"Enoch Arden" (Biograph), 2 reels.

Coming great features are Pathe's "Hunchback of Notre Dame," adapted from the story of Victor Hugo; Milton's "Paradise Lost," 3 reels, by the Vitagraph Co.; "Zigomar," 3 reels, a very fine Eclair production; "The Black Arrow," by the Edison Company, adapted from the story of Robert Louis Stevenson; "The Discovery of America," by the Selig Company. I am booking engagements for these features now.

YANKEE.

THE DRUMMER BOY OF SHILOH (Oct. 23).—The year '61 is a memorable one in the history of this country. Thousands of loyal patriots gave up their lives upon the battlefield and left widows and orphans to the tender mercies of charity. The boy of Shiloh, too young to carry a musket, but too patriotic to remain at home, entered the service as a drummer. With patriotic fervor he beat his drum and led the brave boys into battle.

A stray bullet finally silenced the drum and the drummer. His last dying thought was of his mother and her teachings.

Hardened men, who had seen death every minute of the day, and who faced death all the time, gathered about the little crumpled form and with tears streaming down their cheeks listened to the prayers of the dying drummer boy of Shiloh.

FLOWER OF THE FOREST (Oct. 27).—A roving band of gypsies plying their trades of fortune telling, horse dealing and basket weaving, encamp close to the estate of Captain Laverock, and unable to resist the temptation of poaching, one of their number is caught red-handed by the Captain and receives a severe beating. He leaves the ground vowing vengeance.

The Captain upon reaching his home is accosted by one of the gypsy maids, whose wild beauty attracts his attention. He meets the girl secretly and finally falls madly in love with her. His mad infatuation finally comes to the knowledge of his fiancee, who immediately breaks her engagement. The Captain while out hunting, is shot at by Lemuel, the gypsy whom the Captain had whipped for poaching, and is seen escaping by the gypsy maid. She finds the Captain wounded and conceals him in the woods close to camp.

Stealing some food from the camp she is detected and followed by the king, and several of the gypsies. The girl is brought back to camp and is placed in solitary confinement. She receives a note from the Captain begging for a meeting and when the camp is asleep she steals forth, meets the Captain and informs him who fired the shot. She is banished from the camp and is at loss where to go. The Captain on being informed of her banishment brings her to his home and makes her his wife.

NESTOR.

THE TOWN MARSHAL (Oct. 18).—Poor Major Wright was feeling thoroughly out of sorts—for of late, Hiram Ciders, the town constable, seemed to be making considerable progress in his courtship of Miss Judith Mullen. But could the Major have read the wealthy spinster's feelings aright, however, he would have found no cause for alarm, for so busy had the good lady been in looking after her niece, Flossie, that she had found little time for aught else.

Not that "auntie" had any objection to Dick Morgan, as her niece's suitor, but she considered the girl too young to wed. Indeed, so closely did she keep watch on Flossie, that Dick, coached by the girl's governess, determined to put an end to their stolen meetings by boldly proposing for his sweetheart's hand. To Dick's consternation, "auntie," wishing to frighten away the young man altogether, pretended that she believed he was proposing to her—nor did she dismiss the boy until she had given him two very uncomfortable hours.

Dick's turn for revenge came, however, when he met "auntie's" two admirers, and told each that the other had just proposed to the fair Judith. The result was a quarrel, ending in Major Wright challenging Hiram Ciders to a duel. Dick and James Hurley, who had been asked to act as seconds, had no intentions of having any bloodshed, and therefore carefully extracted the real cartridges from the combatants' revolvers and replaced them with blanks; then, sending a note to Miss Judith Mullen of her admirers' intentions, mentioning the time and place, they calmly awaited the appointed hour. Not so, Hiram Ciders—for Major Wright was far too good a shot to permit him to be calm. Nevertheless, owing to James Hurley's vigilance, the shivering constable was unable to slip away, as had been his intention, and was led pale and trembling, to the "field of honor."

While the backs of the group were turned, he made a wild dash for liberty, so that when "auntie" arrived, she found only the hardy old Major. And so pleased was that lady at her hero's gallantry, that she promptly accepted him then and there, and Dick instantly seizing the favorable moment, was at last overjoyed to receive "auntie's" consent to his marriage with her niece.

MUTT AND JEFF JOIN THE OPERA (Oct. 21).—Grand Opera offers vast opportunities to real singers—there's heaps of money in singing. Mutt is an opportunist, also a singer (so he thinks) and decides to join the operatic field. Jeff's aspirations are laughed to scorn by Mutt, who alone and swaggering goes to the Opera House. Here, the stage hands have considerable fun with the lanky chap, and when the musical director tries his voice—oh! oy! oy! Fortunately for Mutt, an untrained ear is wanted to try the voices of applicants, and he gets the job.

Jeff, feeling pretty sore, sallies forth bent on getting a job for himself. On meeting an actorine friend of his, he is overjoyed to hear that her manager is looking for singers. Would Jeff apply for a posish? Would he?

Mutt tries Jeff's voice, and of course he finds it "rotten." The musical director, however, believes otherwise and almost goes "dippy" over Jeff's high C. . The tables are turned. Mutt is promoted to do sweeping, while Jeff is engaged at a large salary as leading tenor of the Doughpolitan Opera Company. The manager gladly obliges him with a liberal advance, and Jeff, with his actress friend, go out to celebrate the event.

Outside of the stage door, they almost run into poor Mutt industriously sweeping the sidewalk. Such are the mysterious workings of Fate!

THAT BLESSED BABY (Oct. 21).—After Baby Lovering and its doting parents have departed from the quiet Simpson boarding house out in the country, a lonesome feeling pervades the hearts of the old spinsters, Margaret and Elizabeth Simpson.

As the baby is the cause of their lonesomeness, they decide to adopt a child and fill that aching void. Margaret stays behind to take care of the house and Elizabeth goes to the Orphan Asylum, where she soon gathers a lusty babe to her bosom.

On the train, while about to return to the farmhouse, she sees the Loverings in the train just coming in. Desirous to exchange a few words with them, she places the baby in the reluctant arms of a minister and rushes out. The minister, believing it a case of desertion, rushes to catch the woman, who, thinking the good man a kidnapper, frantically seeks to regain the child.

Chases and counter-chases follow, but neither the woman nor the man seem able to connect. An element of mistaken identity creeps in and the minister finds himself in the thickest of trouble. He's mighty glad when matters straighten out at last. As for that blessed baby—it is safe and happy in the home of its two mothers, the old Simpson sisters.

POWERS.

JOHN BAXTER'S WARD (Oct. 24).—A number of ranchmen and cowboys are gathered around the post office of a Western village, expecting their mail. A letter is received by John Baxter, ranchman, from his niece, who is also his ward. The cowboys have been expecting that some day she would visit the ranch and are curious to know what the letter says. Baxter satisfies them by reading them the letter, which states that the young lady will soon arrive. He also shows them a photograph of her and the men agree that she is a "jim-dandy." Ethelbert, the dude cowboy, is there, and is so enraptured with her beauty that he kisses the picture repeatedly. The cowboys give him the laugh, take the photo away from him and "rough-house" him considerably.

Baxter suddenly becomes an important personage in the village. The cowboys visit him at his cabin and treat him with great consideration. They bring him presents; whiskey, tobacco, rope, saddles, etc., hoping thereby to get on the good side of him. All except Ethelbert. He stays at home and has lovely dreams of the beautiful lady. Baxter makes a promise to each cowboy that he will have the preference over the others when the girl arrives.

Finally the great day dawns and the men are all at the depot, dressed in the height of cowboy fashion. Baxter's ward steps from the train while the men look at her in speechless awe. With rare presence of mind Ethelbert steps forward and offers to carry her valise. Instantly there is a rush by the men to carry the bag, but she hands it to Ethelbert, because he spoke first. The girl and Ethelbert start for the ranch house, leaving the cowboys dumbfounded. On the way Baxter's ward and "Bertie" become quite chummy.

The cowboys by this time, are framing up a warm reception for Ethelbert. They find him later, and duck him in the river, which is easily done, because there isn't much fight in him. Thinking it a good joke, the men find the girl and tell her of it, but she doesn't see the point. Instead, she hunts up Ethelbert, and finds him a very wet person. She sympathizes with him and he proposes. The girl accepts and they disappear. There is much excitement in the village over this. Next morning Baxter receives a letter saying that the pair have eloped and are on their way to find a minister. Baxter reads it to the cowboys and laughs. They become angry at this and demand their presents back. Baxter refuses, and walks away laughing, leaving the cowboys quarreling among themselves.

THE LITTLE BROWN CALF (Oct. 24).—A farmer's little daughter is greatly attached to a pet calf that has been given to her by her father. The child's father has been owing on a note to a neighbor, who appears and demands payment or he will make an attachment. While arguing, his eye falls upon the pet calf and he offers to take the calf in payment. This the farmer is loath to do, because the calf belongs to his child and parting with it will be heart-breaking to the little one. At length the farmer consents to give up the calf because there appears to be no other way out of the difficulty.

The child hears of the transaction and weeps for her pet, which will be taken away next morning. She is inconsolable and they put her to bed still weeping. The little girl tosses in her sleep until she awakes. She then determines that she will take the calf and go far away with it so they cannot take it away from her. Rising from bed the child goes in her nightgown to the shed and leads the calf away. When morning comes she and the calf are missed. The neighbor arrives to take possession of the animal, which has disappeared. The party searching for the child find her in the field asleep, with the calf grazing near. The neighbor, noting the strong attachment of the child for the animal, begins to see things in another light. He is not a hard-hearted man. His sympathy is aroused by the child's devotion and he ends the affair by tearing up the note.

THE REVENUE OFFICER'S LAST CASE (Oct. 28).—In a moonshiner's cabin in the backwoods of Kentucky, his daughter is being courted by a young mountaineer, who is also engaged in illicit distillation of liquor. It is plain to be seen that the moonshiner's daughter does not return his sentiments, as she leaves the cabin impatiently. Her father appears, and when the young man tells of his trouble, the father merely laughs. Outside the cabin, coming down the road is Jim Thornton, a United States revenue officer, disguised as a mountaineer, bearing a John Doe warrant for anyone whom he might find making moonshine whiskey. Here he meets the moonshiner's daughter and strikes up an acquaintance, which becomes a case of mutual admiration almost at once. They are still talking as the young lover emerges from the cabin. The latter approaches them from behind, and looking Thornton over, fires a shot in the air. This shot is a signal to moonshiners that danger is near. From behind the cabin another shot echoes in answer, for the father and his son are busy there taking liquor out of a hiding place in the ground. The disappointed lover goes to them and tells them of Thornton talking with the girl and of his suspicion of the revenue officer, after which he starts for home through the woods.

On his way he comes across Thornton and the girl still talking. He takes occasion to tell the revenue man that he is not safe in those parts and had better be going. Finally the jealous youth forces a quarrel, but Thornton gets the better of it. Taking the young man's gun from him, he sends him on his way.

The following day as Thornton is going down the road he is shot from ambush by the young moonshiner, who hates him bitterly. Thornton is found lying wounded in the road by the moonshiner's daughter, who assists him to her father's cabin. In loosening his shirt at the throat, the young woman discovers the warrant and knows for sure that he is a revenue officer, but by this time she is extremely fond of him and in order to shield him, places the warrant in the bosom of her dress.

After three weeks Thornton is well and strong again. He is on good terms with the old moonshiner and his son and thanks them heartily for their assistance, but the two moonshiners are still a trifle suspicious. Thornton hides behind a bush in the rear of the cabin and awaits developments. Presently the girl's brother and her would-be lover is more important in winter than it is in summer. In the summer you can open front and rear doors and windows, if you have them, and the people won't complain about drafts.

But in winter, with doors and windows closed you must exhaust hot, dead air, and draw in cold, fresh air in large quantities, but yet in a way that will be imperceptible to the public.

The one best way to do this is to install

KIMBLE

ALTERNATING CURRENT VARIABLE SPEED
REVERSIBLE ELECTRIC

FANS

Listen: Kimble fans are different from other electric ventilating fans

First: They are instantly reversible from intake to exhaust, by the pull of a chain.

Second: They can be made to run at any speed, fast or slow, forward or back, by the same convenient chains

Third: Operating cost is always exactly proportionate to speed, and when you decrease speed you decrease cost, by just so much.

Fourth: Even at the highest speed they consume less current in proportion to the number of cubic feet of air moved than any other motors.

Fifth: Their starting pull is less than full running load. For instance, the 36-inch fan-motor starts on 4 amperes, runs at full load on 8 amperes, and reverses from full speed forward to full speed backward, on 9 amperes and moves 17,300 cubic feet of air per minute when run at full speed. These figures will astonish your central station man.

Send for list of sizes, prices and capacities.

appear at the riding place to remove some of the signs. As they do so the others covers them and places them under arrest. The old moonshiner, coming upon the scene is also arrested. The excitement attracts the moonshiner's daughter, who takes in the situation. She then pleads for her father and the other two and finally convinces Thornton that it is to get that he owes his life in more ways than one.

Thornton realizes that he owes a debt of honor, and as the girl produces the warrant, he writes upon the back of it his resignation from the secret service and casts his lot with the moonshiner's daughter. As the two walk away the jealous lover raises his gun to shoot Jim Thornton, but the girl's father knocks the gun aside and allows the two lovers to proceed unmolested.

ECLAIR.

A LUCKY CHANGE (Oct. 16).—Staid Mr. Servin is distressed to note the flirtatious habits of his charming daughter. He decides to engage for Lucy a very strict governess, and the girl is outraged at being introduced to a stern, unbending woman wearing black spectacles, and a positively ugly dress. Who will come near a girl who has for a companion such an ogress! Lucy consults a friend, and together they formulate a little plot. Accordingly, at a moment's notice, they rush upon the unsuspecting governess, taking away her black "goggles," fluffing out her hair into charming little waves and tendrils, and replacing the offensive gown with a neat, stylish one. The change is complete, and despite her former protests, the governess cannot but be pleased with herself. At the psychological moment Mr. Servin arrives on the scene, and is astonished, but pleasantly, to see so comely a person before him, and the old man is moved to a marked display of his approval. This time it is Lucy who catches her father flirting, and surprises the governess by pouncing upon her, seizing her hand, and placing it in that of her father; she then calls in her lover, and demands that her father do the same for her! Though somewhat annoyed, the father at last consents, "and they lived happy ever after!"

LAKE GARDA (Oct. 16).—Lake Garda, situated on the Tyrol frontier, is one of the most interesting and picturesque lakes of all Italy. In this film we behold as from the cushioned ease of a slow-drifting craft, the marvels of the wondrous vegetation which surrounds the lake—Denzengano and its formidable castles, the noted Isle of Garda, and Garnano, with its groves of lemon trees—indeed, so realistic is the scene, that we are almost beguiled into the belief that the surrounding atmosphere is laden with the pungent and refreshing odor of the lemon blossom.

CHAMPION.

THE COPPERHEAD (Oct. 23).—During the Civil War there were a great many Northerners whose sympathies were with the South. They believed that the war was an unjust aggression maneuvred by Northern politicians, and aided unthinkingly by hot-heads in the South. These men possessed more than ordinary moral courage, as they were sneered at by their neighbors and derisively termed "Copperheads."

Old Stewart Witman was one of these. He lived in Michigan in those troublous days. But he had a son who was ardently espousing the cause of the old flag. The boy was only sixteen, but he enlisted in its ranks. Then Witman rose in his might and such a burst of anger that little household had seldom witnessed. Despite tears and protests from wife and daughter, Witman scratched the name of his first born from the family records, for the heart of the old "Copperhead" was adamant.

We now see the boy drilling the awkward squad—a truly laughable scene, but withal a heart-rending exhibition of wonderful devotion. Later on we witness how these boys fight for the old flag, with that youngster gallantly leading them through the thick of strife. Thus does he serve his country honorably until the close of the war; though the heart of his parent is untouched. He has no son.

The boy carves a name for himself in civil life. The war is over. He enters college and then educates himself for the law. But dark days have come upon the old man—the father. He is about to be ejected from the old homestead, and this news comes to the ears of the boy, who is now on the fair road to prosperity.

So one day he comes back. But his parents recognize him not. He makes himself known and is clasped in his dear mother's arms. The father turns from him—though his old heart wells up with tears. The boy stretches forth his hand and suddenly all barriers are thrust aside; father and son unite in one loving embrace.

LAW OR THE LADY (Oct. 25).—This story concerns Dan Coulee, a supposed cattleman, his only daughter, Mary, and her sweetheart, Bob Weston. Bob has been elected sheriff.

Bob is elated at his good luck and comes to tell his sweetheart. Her father is there at the time, but doesn't seem to share the enthusiasm engendered—yet he likes Bob amazingly and has no objection to Bob marrying his daughter. But if Mary was overjoyed at the good fortune of Bob, she was also harassed with fear for his safety, as Bob's first mission was to capture a noted outlaw known as "Black Robert."

This man had been terrorizing the vicinity for some time, doing his work single-handed, and his deeds were much talked of. Dan Coulee could have wished that anyone else than Bob had gotten the sheriff's job; perhaps because of the desperate character of the bandit.

It so happens that Bob's posse are compelled to return, and Bob decides to follow the trail of the outlaw alone, for which undertaking his bravery and heroism are rewarded with success. His daring riding and unsurpassed courage has done for him what others have failed in—he has captured the famous Black Robert!

He is downhearted and miserable, for his prisoner is none other than the father of his own sweetheart, Dan Coulee—the supposed cattleman. No wonder Dan hated to see his intended son-in-law become sheriff. Should he arrest or release Dan?

His sense of duty won out. It is needless to say that Mary was broken-hearted. But she saw that while her father was lacking in goodness, she had found in her sweetheart one who could rise sublimely above all self-considerations and dare to do right, in choosing The Law or The Lady.

BILL PAYS HIS DEBTS (Oct. 20).—Bill is dead broke, and his hard-hearted creditors gather round like carrion crows. In vain he tries his wily arts and blandishments upon them. It is quite evident that he will either have to go to America and there get married or go to work. Bill sallies forth in search of employment or a rich widow, not particularly caring which in his despair, and chances upon a stray bear. Bruin decides to go into partnership with William and they soon scare away all the creditors. The way Bruin handles the creditors causes much wholesome fun and cannot fail to appeal to young and old.

HENPECKED BERTIE GOES FISHING (Oct. 20).—Henpecked Bertie and the henpecker sit one sultry afternoon, in their garden beside the river. The Henpecker has a headache and so the Henpecked has to stay home. He makes several amusing attempts to escape, but in vain, for the eagle eye of the Henpecker watches over all. Finally the Henpecked one is provided with a rod and line and told to exhaust his superfluous energy tempting little fishes to partake of a fat little worm. The Henpecker retires to the house where she can survey the piscatorial efforts of her beloved. Bertie then establishes communication with some fellow members of the Honorable Order of the Henpecked, and they row off in a boat, leaving a very fair but inanimate model of Bertie dangling his line in the silvery stream. Bertie goes off to the Casino and has high jinks. Later Mrs. The Henpecker comes from her watch tower and, in embracing the supposed Bertie, knocks the said Bertie into the river. She then dives in to save him, and things look very serious. Bertie happens to be surveying the results of his prank from afar off, and he witnesses this thrilling rescue. He forgets all previous wiggins, plunges into the river, arriving just in time to save his wife. Explanations follow and now it is the Henpecked who has turned Henpecker. Verily doth the Cookoo mock married men, but it is delightful to be married, all the same.

HIS FIDELITY INVESTIGATED (Oct. 21).—Mr. Brown, a young married gentleman, is in need of a young lady as private secretary at his office, and inserts an advertisement in one of the daily papers. He mentions this fact to his wife at the breakfast table, and after he leaves for the office, she immediately decides upon a course of action to test her husband's faithfulnes believing that this is the right opportunity. She calls up an intimate friend and together they proceed to a detective agency, where they acquire the services of an attractive young lady detective to apply at Mr. Brown's office for the situation. Thoroughly enjoying her new case, this young lady detective is seen entering the office of Mr. Brown, who is not slow in deciding that she is just the young lady he wants. He is very enthusiastic about his private secretary, and does not lose much time in conveying this fact to her, much to the chagrin of the office clerk, who is also violently smitten with her. At this point Mrs. Brown, having received her cue, enters the office and upon finding the door closed peeps through the keyhole. She is rather dismayed at what she sees, but quickly decides to get even. Mr. Brown, hearing sounds in the outer office, also looks out through the keyhole, and sees his wife embracing the clerk. The door opens, and Mrs. Brown confronts her husband, while the private secretary departs, having accomplished her end to the entire satisfaction of Mrs. Brown. Mr. Brown has later a very difficult task to perform, namely, that of assuring his wife of his faithfulness, and while thus engaged, the former private secretary enters unannounced, and presents her bill to Mrs. Brown for services rendered in investigating Mr. Brown's fidelity.

THREE DAUGHTERS OF THE WEST (Oct. 16).—Two cowboys belonging to the "Crescent Bar" outfit, while out looking for missing cattle, catch a gang of rustlers in the act of running off their employer's stock. Charley Morton, the foreman, immediately starts for the ranch to inform the ranch owner and the cowboys pursue the fleeing cattle thieves.

Jim Darrow, the ranch owner, is the father of three lovely girls, true daughters of the West, who are fond of hunting and all outdoor sports. They have just succeeded in obtaining their father's consent to go hunting, when the foreman arrives with his news. Charley warns his sweetheart, Bessie Darrow, that hunting in the hills is dangerous while the rustlers are about.

He rides away with his employer to join the boys in running down the rustlers, and the girls are left alone. Clara and Ellen prepare to carry out their original intention to go into the hills and hunt deer, but Bessie, remembering her lover's warning, is more prudent and advises her sisters to stay at home. The two younger girls prevail and they start for the hills.

In the meantime Darrow and his foreman join the cowboys and start to look for the rustlers. Safely hidden among the rocks the outlaws watch the searching party ride by their hiding place and start for the open plains beyond. After they are gone the rustlers emerge and start on the back trail.

They see the ranchman's daughters coming in the distance and plan to eke out their vengeance on the girls. They dismount beside the trail and attempt to hold them up but meet with resistance that is as surprising as it is effective. Then the girls turn and flee with the angry rustlers in pursuit.

Hard pressed, the girls leave their horses and make a stand in the hills on the edge of a high cliff. The rustlers follow them, but from their point of vantage the plucky girls easily hold the rustlers at bay.

At last their ammunition is exhausted and it is only a matter of time until the rustlers will learn of their predicament and capture them. The girls are in despair when a plan suggests itself to the fertile mind of Bessie.

Taking her rope she adjusts the noose to her foot and her two sisters lower her over the edge of the steep cliff. Slowly the daring girl is lowered until her feet touch the ground below. Then she hurries away to warn her father and lover.

The searching party have heard the firing and are on their way back when they meet Bessie on the trail. She mounts behind her lover and they go around the cliff to join the girls, while the ranchman and the cowboys make for the rustlers' location.

The rustlers have discovered that the girls are out of ammunition and rushing up they secure Clara and Ellen. They attempt to drag the girls away when their attention is attracted to the ranchman and the cowboys. The rustlers prepare to fight, when Charley comes up behind them and fells one of the outlaws with the butt of his gun and the stricken man rolls over the edge of the cliff. The remaining rustler turns to face the foreman and in a desperate hand to hand fight, Charley is victorious and throws the rustler over the precipice to join his companion. Bessie runs to her lover and her sisters thank their brave champion for their timely deliverance.

THE CAVES OF LA JOLLA (Oct. 16).—Many beautiful pictures have been made by foreign manufacturers of picturesque places in their own country, but none of them surpass the natural beauty and rugged grandeur of our own West.

The American Company, bearing in mind that very few pictures of this class have been produced for the pleasure and instruction of the American public, have produced a marvelous picture of the "Caves of La Jolla," that is stereoscopic in photography, magnificent in perceptive, sublime in grandeur, and faultless in every respect. The splendid vista unfolds itself to the spectator, as if he were looking upon the actual scene himself.

Minneapolis, Minn.—The Third Ward Republican Hall has been leased to the Oswalt-Henning Company, who will conduct the place as a moving picture theater for the next two years.

Memphis, Tenn.—Four new motion picture theaters will be opened in Main Street within a very short time. Work will commence within thirty days on a $25,000 theater at 167 and 171 South Main Street. It has been leased for a term of years to the Trimble Amusement Company and will be called the Princess. Seats will be provided for 700. The first motion picture theater for the Trimble Amusement Company will be opened September 15, at 99 North Main Street. The other two theaters are promised to follow soon.

ANNOUNCEMENT No. 11

Talk No. 2 on Exclusive Service The Road to Success is a Hard One

IN the Film Business the number of individual successes is greatly disproportionate to the great magnitude and general success of the Film industry.

We might say your GROWTH has become as much a MENACE as a SUCCESS; You have reached A POINT WHERE the attack of a PROGRAMME COMPETITOR, be he EXHIBITOR or EXCHANGE, THREATENS YOUR EXISTENCE:—YOU have founded an institution passing from the storeshow of early days to the building of a modern picture palace, and the investment of thousands of dollars in a business which excites your highest admiration and pride; and if you have not been too busy WITH the struggle—YOU ALREADY SENSE THE DANGER OF YOUR SITUATION. That monument to your efforts is standing on a shaky foundation.

PROGRAMME COMPETITION has driven you from THE STORESHOW to the PICTURE PALACE—You have FOUNDED an institution, mortgaging the future without protecting the mortgage—Your position is MORE insecure to-day than when YOU occupied your STORESHOW—Your magnitude constitutes your danger—Large investments need the security of stable conditions.

SERVICE on a NON-EXCLUSIVE PROGRAMME places you in the HANDS of your competitor and leaves you without protection—Your EXCHANGE cannot protect your bill—YOU may be FORCED TO BID for the right to your bill—You are not selling your picture palace; but the interest embodied in your programme, or so many hours of profitable amusement. You have protected one part of your future in procuring the proper Exhibition Hall; but the thing you would exhibit, the thing you are actually selling; the thing for which you have made all your investment, in fact the only thing which constitutes an asset in your business, you are gambling with—Your bill or programme you leave unprotected. ANY moment the right to that programme may be refused you.

EXCLUSIVE SERVICE means a guarantee against that REFUSAL; it means the endowment of your enterprise with an asset—The granting of a franchise right in the PROGRAMME, the value of that franchise is easily equal to the capitalization value of your EXHIBITION HALL—EXCLUSIVE SERVICE offers you such asset. The ability to secure to you such an asset explains the countrywide interest in our proposition and our deliberation in choosing our Exhibitors.

If there is no National Exhibitor in YOUR town don't lose any time in filing your application along with your credentials—You may be the Exhibitor we most prefer in your town.

STATE RIGHTS BUYERS

IN order to arrange for our next production the product of the Milano-Films Company, the name of which will be announced in next week's Moving Picture World, we have decided to sell immediately the remaining United States and Canadian territory unsold for the exclusive rights of the Dante's "Inferno" production Milano-Films, five reels, and the Helios make, two reels.

TAKE NOTICE. Dante's "Inferno" Milano-Films, five reels, is licensed by the Motion Picture Patents Company and can be exhibited in all licensed picture houses when you are through with the big theatres at high prices, bookings for which are available in every town in the United States and Canada on the usual sharing terms for large theatrical companies.

ALSO NOTE that the Helios two reel production is Independent and is proving a big money maker as a 10c attraction. The wonderful drawing powers of Dante's "Inferno" is amply demonstrated by the fact that neither production hurts the business of the other but on the contrary turn-away business has been the rule wherever both films have been exhibited.

DANTE'S "INFERNO" films will be a money maker for the next ten years and has played to larger audiences than any picture ever manufactured. Engagements in large theatres have been extended from one week to two, three and four weeks on account of crowded houses which is unprecedented in the amusement business.

NOTICE. We own the copyright on both the Milano and Helios DANTE'S "INFERNO" also the copyright on the dramtic version of DANTE'S "INFERNO".

WARNING. Attempts may be made to advertise spurious productions as DANTE'S "INFERNO" but we hereby issue a warning that any and all infringers will be dealt with to the full extent of the law and ATTENTION IS HEREBY CALLED to Section 28 of the new copyright law which is more drastic than is generally supposed. It is no longer a matter of merely a fine but the status prescribed distinctly, punishment by imprisonment for wanton infringement of the copyright law. To the Users of Excello Flaming Arc Lamps

You must use "Excello" Carbons if you want good results from Excello Lamps.

Any statement to the contrary is false, because good working of these lamps is only guaranteed by the manufacturers, Messrs. Koerting & Mathiesen, Leipsig, when "Excello" carbons are used.

The manufacturer ought to know what carbon his lamp requires, and as the "Excello" Carbon has been specially designed by them for use in their lamp, it stands to reason that it is "the" carbon for that type of lamp.

The Excello Arc Lamp Company of this city say in their catalogue, on page 7:

> "Excello Carbons are superior in quality of material, evenness of texture, precision in shape and dimensions, and freedom from blisters to any carbon yet produced. These are the qualities that have made them famous in every country where flaming arc lamps are used. They are suitable for any type of flaming arc lamp. Each carbon bears the name 'EXCELLO' branded on its side."

In view of this statement it will be hard for anyone to make the consumer believe any other brand is as good as the "Excello."

See that every carbon which you buy bears the name "EXCELLO" and that each package is labeled with the trade mark.

Sold by All Electrical Supply Dealers.

EVEN BETTER
THAN YOUR ELECTRIC BELLS

Although the Electric Bells paid for themselves the first two weeks they were installed.

So says an exhibitor who has recently installed a set of our ALUMINUM CHIMES

Our Aluminum Chimes have a very beautiful tone and a very imposing appearance as well, and can be played by any one musically inclined, with a few minutes' practice, even without previous experience.

vaudeville acts, and the price of a vaudeville act or two will pay for a set of the Chimes, which will moreover be a permanent fixture in your house and always an asset. As the tone is most entrancing it will be a long time before your audience will tire of hearing them.

Each instrument is complete in itself. They are made in sets ranging in price from $40.00 and up.

Our set No. 21, which consists of 25 Chimes, two octaves chromatic, C to C, is the most popular set we manufacture, and the price of same is $125.00.

We will ship you the above set or any of the various sets of Chimes which we manufacture, C.O.D., with privilege of examination and 5 days, trial upon receipt of $10.00 as a guarantee of good faith, and, should the Chimes not be satisfactory in every way, same may be returned at our expense.

LOLA REFUSES TO MARRY THE GYPSY KING'S SON

The Gypsy Bride

PROUD and haughty, Mr. Hathaway refuses to accept for a daughter-in-law a Gypsy maid with whom his son Frank has fallen in love. Frank marries the girl of his choice and becomes a cowboy, but before long is stricken ill. Still his father refuses to see him. How the arrival of the stork in the boy's home brings the father to his senses and to his sick son's aid is a story too charming to miss

THE THANHOUSER TWO-A-WEEK

COMING! The Best Indian Story Ever Written COMING!

The Last of the Mohicans

From the novel by James Fenimore Cooper, will be released Friday, November 10th.

"'Tis too late, 'tis too late!" Hawkeye exclaimed, dropping the useless piece in disappointment; "the miscreant has struck the rapid; and had we powder, it could hardly send the lead swifter than he now goes!"

Does not this quotation from the novel give you a vivid picture of a man-hunt across wild country? That's what the story is about. It is a chase in pursuit of malevolent Indians, who have in their power two hapless girls.

The Loves OF David Copperfield

Third of the Series from the Novel By CHARLES DICKENS

Released Tuesday, October 31st

This chapter of David's life presents a simple study of character development.

David's marriage to Dora, "his doll-wife" is unfortunate and does not result in happiness for either. Dora dies shortly after their marriage. David two years after the death of his first wife, learns that Agnes is in love with him. He marries her and in this second matrimonial venture he is more fortunate than in the first.

The story of Uriah Heep's forgeries are threaded with David's love affairs. Loquacious Mr. Micawber also plays a prominent part in this chapter of the play.

Their Burglar

"A Comedy of Errors"

Released Friday, November 3rd

Ordinarily a visit from a burglar means a charge on the ledger against "Profit and Loss." But "Their Burglar" through one of those intangible twists of fate becomes the special messenger of both Fortune and Cupid and delivers a note to a yearning youth and brings him to the side of the one he loves.

As a reward for his services the burglar is given all the wedding presents he had come to steal—because he had helped to rescue the bride from a loveless marriage. These gifts give the burglar a new start in life and later he turns plumber. Then it becomes a lead-pipe cinch for him to make a living and be honest.

MAJESTIC

INDEPENDENT FILMS
Improving with each picture

¶ Since our last announcement we have added two pictures to our collection and can truthfully state that they are better than our first ones.

¶ There is not a single exchange in the United States or Canada that will not be proud to add these pictures to its service, simply because they are exactly the class of pictures the exchanges need and the kind most suitable to exhibitors.

¶ We are able to attain these splendid results because the interests directly connected with this company are comprised of men thoroughly familiar with the class of pictures most essential to the betterment of exchange interests.

¶ If the Independent exchanges buy the MAJESTIC PICTURES, they will increase their business, because we will have competent actors and actresses in all pictures, actors and actresses who have made big names for themselves, as well as big reputations for manufacturers, and people whose names will crowd theatres and make exhibitors demand the film.

¶ The MAJESTIC is endeavoring to look far into the future of the entire industry rather than thinking of its own immediate welfare.

¶ The MAJESTIC cannot presume to carry out these ideas alone. It must have the combined support of all manufacturers who care for the future of the moving picture industry.

OUR FIRST FIVE RELEASES

Release date, Nov. 6th "THE THREE SHELL GAME"

Dick Hankle, an outcast, after many rebuffs, succeeds in getting work at the home of a poor ranchman, named Weston. He and Weston go to the bank to deposit Weston's savings. There they meet a three-shell man, who induces Weston to gamble away his money. Returning heart broken, the wife and daughter pursuade Weston to discharge Dick, believing him guilty of having urged Weston to play. Made desperate by his ill fortune, Dick goes forth to seek the three-shell man. He meets the gambler in a lonely trail and recovers Weston's money, which he returns for Weston's daughter. How he secured possession of the money makes one of the most exciting and genuinely entertaining films ever produced. Don't fail to ask for it.

Release date, November 9th "THE MEXICAN"

Jose Curvez, a Mexican, while wandering idly about his ranch, discovers a baby girl. The years roll by, and Dolores grows into a beautiful girl. The Mexican has trouble with the lawless cowpunchers and, thinking Dolores would be safe, sends her to do the shopping. She too is reviled and insulted and rushes home. The cowpunchers bombard the house and Dolores seeks aid. Clarence Stowell, and a band of ranchmen, put the invaders to flight and Stowell immediately makes love to the beautiful Dolores. But the Mexican, hating all Americans, gathers his friends and starts a race war, and after an intensely interesting battle, is finally captured. He and Dolores are about to be hung when Clarence again comes to the rescue. The aged Mexican then reveals the circumstances surrounding Dolores' birth, and is permitted to go his way. A magnificent portrayal of the early race wars in California.

Through His Wife's Picture

Mr. Nelson is "newlywed" and carries his darling wife's picture with him always. However, he almost fails for the temptation to go to the mask ball, creating an erstwhile lady friend to go with him, telling her that he would dress as a pirate and she to go as a Spanish gypsy. At the sight of his wife's portrait, however, he realizes his intended wrong-doing and changes his mind, asking a friend to go in his stead. The office boy mixes the letters and wifey gets the one he intended for the girl, and she goes to catch her erring hubby. So while hubby waits at home, wifey is keeping her eyes on the bold, bad pirate she believes to be her husband.

THE LONG ROAD

Destiny's Roadway With Its Many Turns

At a garden party, Edith, in a spirit of coquetry, arouses the jealousy of Ned, her fiancé, who, taking her action seriously, gives a parasol, which he intended as a present for her, to another girl. This induces a quarrel, and both stubborn, the break is never mended. Hence, he marries the other girl. Heart-crushed, Edith seeks solace in the convent as a Sister of Mercy. Some time later, Fate ordains it that she be assigned to embroider the layette of Ned's first baby, a task often undertaken by the sisters. This, you may imagine, is a terrible ordeal, but there is no help for it and the task is finished, which brings about the first meeting since the day of the garden fete between the two women. Several years later, while Edith is working among the poor of the East Side, she is startled by a sound of a shot, and following a small boy into the saloon from whence the sound came, finds Ned, who, having suffered business reverses, and become a hopeless drunkard, the accidental victim of the shot, with his child, now grown to boyhood, and his wife by his side. Ned has now reached the final turn in the road.

Thomas A Edison

The Edison Type "B" Underwriters' Model

WITHOUT question the one machine on the market today that will "stand up" always under the most trying conditions. Invented by Thomas A. Edison, and perfected and manufactured at his own factories. A modern mechanism in every respect — one that projects "rock-steady," flickerless pictures, and does not fail at the important moment when your audiences are expectantly waiting for the first picture. Let us tell you more about it in a letter.

Scene from "THE REFORM CANDIDATE"

EDISON FILMS—Oct. 31st to Nov. 4th inc.

TUESDAY, OCTOBER 31st

"THE REFORM CANDIDATE"

Cast

Curtis Greer, President of the Inter-Urban Street Railway Company ..... Robert Brower
His daughter ..... Miriam Nesbitt
John McNamara, a machine candidate ..... Charles Ogle
Henry Brice, a reform candidate ..... Harold M. Shaw
Editor of the "Morning Echo" ..... Charles M. Seay
Edith, a reporter ..... Mary Fuller

A story of politics—graft against honesty. Through the aid of the young woman reporter, the latter wins. Full of brisk movement from beginning to end, it makes a splendid release for Election time.

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 1st

"THE RISE AND FALL OF WEARY WILLIE"

Cast

Weary Willie ..... William West
Rev. Dr. Helpall ..... Bigelow Cooper
Newspaper reporter ..... Yale Benner
A lucky tramp ..... Edward O'Connor

A comedy of a decidedly unusual nature. A minister decides to live the life of a tramp, thereby bringing about a very unexpected situation. Full of humor and with plenty of human nature.

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 3rd

"THE GIRL AND THE MOTOR BOAT"

Cast

The girl ..... Mary Fuller
Her mother ..... Miriam Nesbitt
A young inventor ..... Darwin Karr
His rival ..... Marc McDermott

A story with a real thrill. We have had many scenes in automobiles, but we believe this is the first time a girl has been shown at close view in a motor boat going twenty-five miles an hour. Taken at the Thousand Islands.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 4th

"LOVE AND HATRED"

From "The Greater Hate," by Roy Norton

Cast

A young school-teacher ..... Reeva Greenwood
Her two suitors ..... { Charles Ogle / Yale Benner }

Strong Western drama. A young school-teacher chooses the more outwardly attractive of her two admirers, but the choice is an unfortunate one. She is deserted, but in the end all comes out well.

Facts and Comments

FOR the first time in the history of moving pictures has an American exhibitor received a prison sentence for violating the law, which regulates the admission of minors into moving picture theaters. Agents of a society for protecting the morals of the young have after an investigation pronounced this man's place to be "the worst in New York." A harsher criticism than this could hardly be passed upon any place of amusement. It appears, that this man had been guilty of the same offense before and had been let off with a fine, coupled with a warning to expect the utmost limit of the law on his next conviction. He chose to disregard the warning. The MOVING PICTURE WORLD has on more than one occasion recorded its opinion on the law regarding the admission of minors. We believe, that its conscientious observance is a distinct benefit rather than a hardship to the self-respecting exhibitor.

OUR esteemed contemporaries of the daily press are amused over the Canadian attitude toward so-called American historical pictures. Canadians have objected to pictures showing American victories over the British in the War of Independence. They are now accused of being supersensitive and narrow-minded. One paper imputes a total lack of humor to the Canadian character and another speaks of the Canadian attitude toward these moving pictures as a piece of petty spite. Is it not fair to look at the other side of this question? The British as well as the Americans have time and again proved their valor on the field of battle, but the fortunes of war could not always favor both sides at the same time. The pictures are onesided, because they show only the triumphs and unfairly omit the defeats of the Americans.

Suppose a Canadian or British film maker were to make a specialty of producing pictures of battles, fought on American soil, and won by the British against the Americans, such battles, for instance, as Lundy's Lane and the surrender of General Hull in the war of 1812. Suppose these pictures were to be pressed on American exchanges and American exhibitors and shown to American audiences. Would we not hear a protest from the American press against a partial and unfair representation of history in moving pictures? If history is to be taught by the moving picture, due regard should always be had to fairness and accuracy. The day, let us hope, is near at hand, when the producer of historical pictures will not be satisfied by the hasty perusal of a book or two in a library, but will, in an honest effort to give a true portrayal of past events, consult the historian. Too many of the present day historical pictures are historical in name only.

KING George V, of England, it is said, advised the Canadian governor, his royal uncle, to submit to the moving picture camera. As a result the installation ceremonies with the Duke and Duchess of Connaught as the central figures will be seen by millions of loyal Canadians and by the world generally. The divinity, that "doth hedge a king about" is enhanced and magnified rather than threatened and impaired by the man with film in the box. Royalty as an institution depends today as much as ever on gorgeous display and "the pomp of circumstance." If the solemn ceremonies of a coronation or the installation of a royal governor can be witnessed in moving effigy by millions instead of thousands then the impression created by them will naturally be all the greater. An enlightened modern monarch will recognize in the moving picture a prop of the throne rather than a violation of kingly dignity.

IN connection with this topic we want to say a word for the flag of our country. It is a sacred emblem and should be treated as such by the makers of moving picture films. One of the worst uses, to which the uag can be put is to cover up the poor quality of a picture. This trick should be left to cheap vaudevillians, who must resort to the waving of the flag, because it's their only way of "getting them." Our national bump of reverence is by no means overdeveloped and the flag is one of the things we ought to respect at all times and everywhere. Too often, when a picture is awfully bare or stupid or vulgar and the spectator begins to regret the absence of outlawed eggs a child bearing the American flag is rushed across the stage and the situation is supposed to be saved. This sort of maneuver only cheapens and degrades both the flag and the moving picture.

IN its world-conquering tour the moving picture has invaded ancient Egypt, the land of mysteries. In the city of Cairo and in other places in the country of the Pharaohs, moving picture theaters are becoming more and more numerous and promise to become the most popular form of amusement. They have however encountered a grave danger, from which the picture in other parts of the world seems to have been happily delivered. Cairo and Alexandria are threatened with an influx of offensive and obscene pictures, with which the local police of the towns mentioned are now battling. There is an element in both cities, that seems to need a vigorous repression and it is this element, which is seeking to introduce objectionable films. We notice with regret, that some European film producers have sent their agents into the cities with pictures, that could not even be vaguely described in these columns. The police there are sometimes hampered by the British toleration of native customs and traditions, but it is to be hoped that they will see their way clear toward blocking any effort to make the ancient country the dumping ground of pictures, which even Paris has rejected.

THE officials of the National Association of Exhibitors, we are glad to say are active in their propaganda for organization and have succeeded in organizing several states since the adjournment of the National Convention in Cleveland. All the states organized will be affiliated with and represented in the National organization. The executive committee of the National Association will meet on November 1st in Columbus, O., to transact business of importance and a full attendance is expected. Representatives from states, not organized, are especially invited to attend this meeting. They will receive all the advice and assistance in starting and perfecting local organizations, which experience enables the executive committee to give. The MOVING PICTURE WORLD deems it a duty, as the sincere and earnest friend of the exhibitor, to advise exhibitors to take advantage of this opportunity.

Recent events in Minneapolis, to which editorial reference has been made in the last issue, show not only the necessity of organizing, but the positive dangers of a lack of organization. The instinct of self-preservation alone should persuade exhibitors to organize. They are still in too many places at the mercy of sensation-seekers and self-advertising reformers. The arrogant boast of a priest in Coeur d'Alene, that he had "put a picture house out of business" could never have been made good, if exhibitors had the strength of resistance, that is born of effective organization. In almost every case the organizations of exhibitors will have the good will of the best elements in the community, if they are wise enough to maintain a high standard of membership. The majority of exhibitors in the country today realize or begin to realize the responsibilities of their business and are quick to resent the intrusion of undesirable elements. Organization will impart new power to their efforts for good and clean management. If the officials of the National Association will persevere in their good work, which seems certain, there is every hope that at the next National Convention not one important state will be left unrepresented.

The Real Esperanto

Moving Pictures the Language of the World.

BY W. STEPHEN BUSH

THE moving picture is the real "esperanto," the universal language, the realized ideal of the ingenious scholars, who gave the Volapuek and the Esperanto systems of language to the world. Pictures existed before the speech of mankind became confused at the Tower of Babel and continued after men began to talk in various tongues. Pictures have always laughed at geographical or racial differences and it must be confessed that in spite of the vast distance between the rude drawing of the Chinese cartoonist and the pen of Rembrandt and Coreggio, they all convey a thought, understood, more or less imperfectly in every place where men have eyes and the rudiments of a thinking apparatus.

The American moving picture is a signally conspicuous proof of the international character of the cinematograph. Fresh from its factory in New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia and Chicago it is unrolled before admiring audiences, which do not understand a syllable of the language of the makers and have never seen the country, in which it was produced. In every part of Europe and South America, in Australia, in Asia and Africa the language of the picture is understood without learning any alphabet or wasting gray matter on such atrocities as irregular verbs and the changing moods of the miserable adjective. The hidalgo, fresh from his hacienda, selling the product of his year's labors in a coast town, the spectacled professor in Germany, the volatile Boulevardier and the stolid Breton, the heterogeneous family of John Bull at home and in all his dependencies, the Irvingesque type of Dutchmen in Holland and Flanders, the lively population of Italy no less than the hooded Turk, the caste-ridden Hindoo, the descendant of the pirates of Malay, still handy in the use of his "kris," the untutored savage in Africa and on the Bowery, can see the story of the picture—in short all the curious inhabitants of the Earth can understand the moving picture. Think of a motley gathering such as here described, and one trying to make the other understand, jabbering and swearing and uttering cries of despair. All is confusion, dissonance and jarring discord. Now watch the operator put his machine in readiness, place the reel in his magazine and the noise begins to subside. He has his focus, the right carbons in the right place and presently the crank begins to turn and the eyes of all are directed toward the screen. Quiet reigns and the minds that but a moment ago seemed like "sweet bells jangled" have found rest and occupation. Could a professor of Esperanto or Volapuek do as much?

The universal language exists. Its subject is the world and its adjective the man. Like Dante's verse it stands erect on subject and adjective. It teaches, delights, entertains, pleases, informs, something, which no grammar ever did or is ever likely to do. It makes learning and the pursuit of knowledge a pleasure and a benefit all at the same time. The inventors and students of Volapuek and Esperanto might with great advantage to themselves and to mankind turn their activities in the direction of the moving picture. Therein lies the hope of a language, understood with equal ease in the purlieus of Boston and along the Puntas Arenas, where the naked Patagonian savage waits for the gifts of the tide.

What we need in the development of the picture to its highest destiny is the aid of just such men as the sponsors of schemes of universal language.

A FUNCTION OF THE FILM.

From the London Morning Post.

One talks of the increase in the value of money, but really the increase in the value of time is much greater. It has killed many things dear to the past generations, among them the old-fashioned novel. How many nowadays read the calm Jane Austen or the stormy Charlotte Bronte? With these authors Samuel Lover hardly ranks. To-day he is well-nigh forgotten. Yet in his own day he was popular and his merits remain. In bringing about this change, many things have borne a part, among them the railway, which demoded half of Scott; the growth of illustration and, in these later days, the kinetograph.

Now, however, people who have never heard of Rory O'More in ballad or novel are to see something of him in living pictures. The novel is not the first that has been taken. But the literary movement in kinematography now begins in earnest. An American company has conceived the idea of reproducing on the screen the most notable Irish romances, and to that end despatched a large company of capable actors to re-eanct the story on the spot. With Rory O'More it makes a good beginning. The film exhibited at a private view is one of the best of its kind. In a few weeks it will have been projected on to the screens of hundreds of kinematograph houses—which in the United Kingdom now number over two thousand. First and last, millions will now see something of Rory O'More of whom they have perhaps never heard of in song, novel or play. They will not get all of Lover, but they will see pictured the most stirring incidents of a most romantic story. They will see the rebel in hiding visited by his colleen, the little love scene between them so beautifully rendered that one would be ashamed to overhear their speech. They will see Rory discovered by the dastardly informer and chased by the redcoats. See him take to the water and forfeit his chance of escape by returning to save from drowning one of his would-be captors, only to be again arrested. See his trial, his escape from the scaffold, the priest cutting his bonds, his wild run for freedom, and his embarkation with mother and sweetheart, for America. So much as is told is well told. The kinematograph has never got hold of a finer subject, and it may be well that the kinematograph is destined to make a tardy reparation, and that many, after ten minutes watching the passing show, will be tempted to make the acquaintance of the book.

Canadian Imperialists are complaining about having to witness too many deeds of Yankee valor in moving pictures. No reciprocity wanted—excepting Yankee dollars.

Mr. Critic

By LOUIS REEVES HARRISON.

YOU had better quit this business and become a baseball umpire. Then your heart will be safe—you will only get your head broken. If you ever attempt to do your best for the subscribers of your paper and at the same time please every man who advertises in it, a sad duty will be imposed upon your family—that of calling a specialist to ascertain whether you are to be retired to a sanitarium or elected president of the steel trust. If you have really persuaded yourself that you know a good photoplay when you see it, go ahead and say so, but give your reasons if you want to be convincing. Discontent with puerilities and transparent unrealities of the photoplay does not mean that you know how they can be mended in the interests of producer and exhibitor alike. Your personal opinion is of no particular value or interest—nobody cares how your hair is cut—unless there is something back of it in the way of knowledge, experience, appreciation and suggestion; every man who goes to the theater thinks he is a judge of the performance, and the only difference between him and the average critic is that the latter manages to air his views in print.

The whole truth of the matter is that not one man in a thousand can fully grasp and retain all that is presented on the screen in twenty minutes, especially when it is swiftly followed by other photoplays of varied character. Supposing that you chance to view one of those exceptional dramas that so clearly set forth a beautiful idea as to leave a powerful impression on your mind, are you—I will quote one of the greatest playwrights in the world: "Are you to be trusted in a mental operation so subtle, so complex, so indefinite, so elusive of demonstration as the formation of an opinion on a work of art?"

The critic's first duty is to formulate a careful opinion for those who trust his judgment and place dependence on what he says. He will forfeit confidence of all who support the paper if he lavishes indiscriminate praise upon every one of the thousands of plays announced in the advertising columns. In order to be convincing he must be honest even if he is not always right, but he must be equally honest in deferring to the effect on the audience, and right here comes one of the subtleties referred to by the great playwright just quoted. The critic's course would be a simple one if it was not a paramount duty for him to consider the practical side of the presentation he watches on the screen—whether or not it suits the great majority of the audience, and whether that audience is representative of those all over the country. It is difficult for the keenest observer to note in the enveloping darkness of the auditorium those surface indications of how other hearts are beating, though intense interest is usually manifested by rigidity of attitude and absence of conversation, but it is a very simple matter to listen carefully to nearby comments or even to ask others how a play of especial importance suited them. The trouble with applause is that niose usually comes from the easily amused and unthinking, and they are as far from being representative of the great solid mass as are children at a matinee performance. The public has been accused of stupidity, ignorance, frivolity, lack of taste and a lot of other disqualifications, but it is responsive en masse to those really great plays which subjugate the imagination of cultured and uncultured.

The situation grows more complex when we realize that millions upon millions of our best people do not attend the little theaters because they are repelled by whatever is childish or false in screen presentations. The fact that the solid support of intelligent patrons would be a valuable asset to exhibitors and producers alike has led to some sharp disparagement of inferior photoplays not relished by those who were turning them out, but honest condemnation, like the application of a cautery to a point of disease, has been intended to heal rather than to wound. The best critics in the business are those who have not hesitated to sear morbid spots in the interest of the entire body.

A sensible way to determine what the whole public wants is to give a sweeping glance at its literature and at the nature of its outdoor sports. A comprehensive view of Young America clearly indicates that he likes fair play and is tremendously progressive. I cannot believe that he is ready to sacrifice his love of what is manly, nor his common sense, nor his developing intelligence, nor his reverence for true womanhood for any debased ideals in his leisure moments. He must be won over to faith in moving pictures by what is superlative in quality, an elusive fact that the critic must always and does very often grasp.

While fully appreciating the educational value of plays illustrating great poems or noted works of fiction—commentators have been discovering Shakespeare for three hundred years—it is of minor importance for a critic to see that credit is attached to any play in a distinctive art that depends upon what has been done in some other art. The mission of the critic is to discover and encourage more especially those photo-dramas which stand on their own merits. If the photoplay is to live and flourish as an art by itself, if it is to become one of the forces in our evolution, it must draw its nourishment from what is fresh and vigorous in our time rather than from well-dried classics in literature or the stale air of the footlights. This is an era of sanity, wholesomeness and breadth of view, but it must not be thought that we have no problems to solve nor that people do not feel more deeply because they possess higher sensibilities. With our greater power of mental growth our finer emotions become all the more acute. Every detail that contributes to making a profound impression is of value and to be considered, but the main thing in a really great play is that it presents the heart and soul of humankind through emotions and passions that we quickly recognize as akin to those stirring within us. This means that we must incorporate modern thought even if we utilize classic setting. It is both generous and wise to highly appreciate original photoplays dealing successfully with business, political or social issues of the moment—such productions are live wires—because they prefigure the finest presentations yet to come. All forms of comedy should be in modern garb or that of the future, but in spiritual interpretations of human life other periods of history may be utilized to advantage if present-day sympathies are reached, or if a humanizing idea is involved. The best critics, those writing up to their highest ideals with discrimination and good taste, are helpful to playwrights, producers, directors, actors, exhibitors and all concerned, including the general public, and the man who cannot see this should take off his blinkers.

Proprietors of prominent picture houses in Denver, Col., who are desirous of advancing their admission prices from 5 to 10 cents are compelled to apply for a higher license, paying $200 instead of $100 a year.

The motion picture has become so popular in Chattanooga, Tenn., that the promoters of the various theaters are advancing their admission prices to double their former rates.

Do Longer Films Make Better Show?

By W. STEPHEN BUSH.

WITHIN the last six months the production of subjects, consisting of two or more reels, has shown a marked increase. The most notable of them, Dante's "Inferno" and Torquato Tasso's "Jerusalem Delivered," the former in five and the latter in four reels, have been produced in Europe and marketed in this country independently of any organization of film makers. The success of these two features has greatly stimulated a trend toward releases of greater length among American manufacturers, who had begun to give the possibilities of longer films their earnest attention. As a result releases of greater length have become numerous in both the Licensed and Independent camps. There is every reason to believe that this tendency toward feature films of greater length will continue and that the growing number of such films will bring about some important changes in the business of exhibiting moving pictures. Some of these feature films have been offered as regular releases, the various reels constituting the same subject being given to the exhibitor two or more days apart. The disadvantages of such an arrangement were too obvious, however, to continue very long and of late all reels treating the same subject have been released at the same time and placed in the hands of the exhibitor as special releases. It is upon the theory and practice of a simultaneous release of all one subject reels that these remarks are based.

I think the day when patrons counted the number of pictures and judged the show by quantity rather than by quality has passed never to return. That kind of patronage was never of the most desirable kind. In the course of the development of the moving picture it has been replaced by audiences of a decidedly higher grade and better average. Quality is to-day the test much more than quantity. This has been proved again and again in practice. Two good reels, maintaining a high average, will always win out against a greater quantity of junk. The argument then, that the higher quality will bring the better results, seems indisputably sound.

Viewed from this standpoint of plain logic the feature film ought to be the best guarantee of financial as well as artistic success. The notion so prevalent among the ignorant, that art cannot be served without sacrifice of profit, is fatally wrong. Art in moving pictures pays in dollars and cents, which plain fact is respectfully commended to every person connected with this great industry.

The feature film of greater length must be built upon quality, it must breathe quality in every inch, or it is doomed before it is fairly born. It is a most significant fact that of all feature films so far released either domestic or foreign makers, every one comes up to the test of superior quality. Only people of brains, who understand a story and know how to tell it with effect, are capable of producing such films. No feature film, of which we have any knowledge, has been produced from any original scenario. The time for such productions will come, sooner perhaps that we believe, but it is best that, at present, literature and history shall furnish the materials for the feature film exclusively.

It is the masterpiece of the ages that especially invites filming and the reason for it is very plain. An epic that has pleased and charmed many generations is most likely to stand the test of cinematographic reproduction. A work of fiction, that has moved millions of men and women and children to happy laughter and healthy sorrow will not lose its charm on the screen of a moving picture theater. After all, the word "classic" has some meaning. It implies the approval of the best people in the most enlightened times. The merits of a classic subject are none the less certain because known and appreciated by comparatively few men. It is the business of the moving picture to make them known to all. Because the feature film, as we have seen it so far, has measured up to this great mission of inviting the masses to enjoy the treasures of literature with the favored few, it has found such a profound and instantaneous response wherever it has been shown.

Do practical men agree with this? For an answer we need not confine ourselves to this country, where the proof of success is so manifest to view. In England and in continental Europe the exhibitors have risen to their opportunities. From various parts of England managers have, according to interviews in a British trade journal, expressed themeslves thus: "If the quality of long films is maintained as in 'Zigomar,' short films will eventually become a drug on the market." "These long films enthral one ten times more than short ones, they are so absorbing, that I simply forget all the troubles of my business day." "I believe long films are the future standby of the picture palace." "Of course the public wish for long films or why should I secure the coming long 'uns."

There is no danger that these feature films will become too numerous. Their production requires an extra outlay of money, an unusual amount of skill and experience, often they demand a high degree of scholarship in addition to a thorough knowledge of the silent stage and its peculiar needs. Even the exhibitor with a small seating capacity, with a three reel show, will find the occasional showing of a feature film a profitable venture. A two-reel production will invariably tell the story more satisfactorily than a one-reel effort and the two-reel production ought not to embarrass any exhibitor. To the exhibitor with a large seating capacity the feature film of greater length offers unusual opportunities. It places in his hands a weapon with which he can successfully encounter almost any theatrical opposition.

What the feature film, however, demands absolutely is proper presentation. It will not be slighted. If it is run with undue speed its charm and power will invariably suffer. Music, effects and lecture are indispensable adjuncts. Effects for a feature film can be carefully prepared and rehearsed, having due regard to consistency and psychological moments. There is time, too, for the arranging of a special musical program, which should not be entrusted to any but a competent and experienced player. A lecture will relieve that natural tension and impatience, which a long, dumb show is bound to cause, and will make the story plainer and the enjoyment of the patrons keener.

Nothing could be more suitable to vary the daily program than an occasional feature film. The only difficulty the exhibitor, who is prepared to give such a film proper presentation, must encounter is the securing of a date far enough advanced to allow of effective advertising.

The question of the feature film in more than one reel is a vital one, affecting every branch of the industry, but more especially the exhibitor. It would seem, therefore, that exhibitors ought to be heard from freely and fully. It is hoped that these remarks will give rise to a useful discussion of so important a subject. THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD is the proper forum of such a discussion and the hospitality of its columns is heartily extended to all who have a word to offer on the situation as it stands to-day and as it will probably develop in the future.

Montgomery Looking 'Round.

Mr. F. T. Montgomery, of Jacksonville, Fla., accompanied by Mrs. Montgomery, spent the week of October 14 in New York City. He said to the Moving Picture World man that he was not on business, but came up with his wife to have a good time looking about the big town.

"I am not even looking at a moving picture this time," he declared. "When I left home I told my people that for once I was going to forget the pictures and take a real vacation, and I believe that it is coming to me. I have been to as many regular show houses as we could get to in the week we have been here, but no picture theaters."

"Then it is not true, Mr. Montgomery, that you came up here to find a location for a real picture theater in New York?" the World man asked.

Mr. Frank T. Montgomery.

"No; I am not looking for a theater site in New York, that is, not just yet. You see, I am afraid that these fellows up here would clean me up in short order. I am not used to big town show business and am not quite ready to tackle the problem of giving New York a real picture theater, but I am not saying that it might not come later. There ought to be enough people in this town who appreciate a thing when it is done right to patronize a first-class picture theater, and I may come up here some time and give them a chance to see pictures under the proper conditions. For the present there are plenty of cities like Jacksonville, Atlanta, Charleston and Savannah in the South and in other parts of the country, where the big dramatic attractions seldom go, to keep me busy. The people in those towns like my kind of entertainment and I find it profitable to cater to their wants. I have told you my story so often that you will not need to hear it again. Possibly the time may come when I will feel strong enough to start something in New York, but just now I have business enough in the South to keep me busy."

Notwithstanding Mr. Montgomery's denial it was learned that he had been keeping his eyes peeled for good locations when he was running about town and we do know that he was very much interested in one prominent Broadway location and that he took several good looks at it before leaving town.

After a week spent in sightseeing, shopping and visiting among friends, Mr. and Mrs. Montgomery joined the Glidden Tourists Saturday, October 14, for the long trip overland by automobile to Jacksonville. At Mr. Montgomery's suggestion, Pathe took a motion picture of the start from New York for the Pathe Weekly. If Mr. Montgomery is not a prominent feature in the picture it will not have been his fault.

Motor Generators and Economizers.

J. H. Hallberg Explains the Method of Adapting Current Saving Devices to Direct Current.

The motion picture machine requires for clear and distinct picture projection the most powerful artificial light that can be had, with due respect, of course, to limitations in the amount of current and consequent heat at the aperture, under the regulations of the National Board of Fire Underwriters and the local authorities.

This desire for a powerful arc with a minimum amount of current from the electric company's lines, has during the past four years created a demand for motor generator sets to transform the usual supply voltage at a low amperage into a low voltage, high ampere current, suitable for the projector arc lamp. It is evident, and all those who are skilled in the art will understand, that an economy is effected when employing any kind of an electric transforming device which accomplishes such voltage reduction and consequent transformation from a low to a high ampere current, in place of simply reducing the voltage with the maximum ampere flow, as is done with the ordinary rheostat.

The term "electric economizer" means in this case exactly what it stands for, namely, a device which in performing other duties, at the same time economizes on the amount of electric power required. The writer has in view of the foregoing established and used during the past four years, the term "electric economizer" as the name for all Hallberg products intended to save electric current, no matter whether the device be a motor generator set for changing direct current from one voltage to direct current of a lower voltage for the arc; or motor generator sets for changing alternating current of any kind into direct current for the arc, or if such device be a semi-constant current transformer for controlling projector lamps with alternating current on the line as well as at the arc.

Recently much has been said on the subject of motor generators for direct current, and the writer herewith desires to state that the Hallberg Direct Current Economizer was advertised in the pages and described in the columns of the Moving Picture World nearly four years ago, and over a hundred of them are in daily service.

That device is, in the strict sense of the word, a motor generator, although it performs much more than the mere functions of an ordinary motor generator set. The direct current economizer is made for different voltages ranging from 100 to 750 inclusive and is necessarily constructed on different lines for the different voltages.

For voltages ranging from 100 to 130, the Economizer consists of two entirely separate 55-volt motors, the armatures of which are mounted on the same shaft and connected in series. When there is no load on the machine, the motors act practically the same as two ordinary 55-volt motors with the shafts coupled together when connected in series of 110 volts. When a projector arc lamp is connected across one of these 55-volt machines, the functions of the motors change entirely, due to special compound windings provided. The motor across which the arc lamp is connected becomes a generator; the other machine still remains a 55-volt motor driving the machine (now a generator), and the arc serves as load for the generator and at the same time as a series resistance for the 55-volt motor, thus making it possible to secure double the amount of work out of a given size of machine for this particular purpose.

To analyze the current flow in this device, we will assume the following constants:

1. Line voltage, 110 D. C.
2. Amperes taken from the line = 16.
3. Current delivered to the arc = 30 amp.
4. Arc voltage = 50 to 55.

The above fixed values show that it is possible to take only 16 amperes from 110-volt direct current line and with it produce a 30-ampere, 50 to 55 volt arc, indicating an economy effect of 14 amperes on a 30-ampere arc. At 110 volts this equals 1540 watts saving as compared with a 30-ampere arc controlled by rheostat on 110 volts. The net current saving expressed in percentage is 46⅔% when the direct current economizer is used in place of rheostat on 110 volts.

Of the foregoing current flow, we see that 16 amperes goes through the motor armature which has a potential drop of 55 volts. From the motor armature the current goes through the electric arc, giving a flow of 16 amperes. At the same time we have a second motor operating as a dynamo at about 55 volts which is connected in shunt with the arc, but one leg passes through a compound winding on the motor field merely for controlling purposes. This second machine acting as a generator operating in shunt with the arc delivers about 14 amperes to the arc, which together with the 16 amperes already flowing, makes a total of 30 amperes. The arc, the reader will now understand, serves a twofold purpose: First, as the 55-volt resistance in series with the 55-volt motor. Second, as the load to the extent of 14 amperes for the generator, which is a very clever and useful arrangement, as it not only gives maximum efficiency from an operating point of view, but it also makes an economical device to manufacture.

The practical and successful operation of Hallberg direct current economizers is fully established, and as an illustration of one of the most prominent and interesting installations of this kind, the writer herewith submits a cut made from a photograph taken by Mr. Theodore Newman, manager for Clunes' enterprises in Los Angeles, Cal. The illustration is a reproduction of a part of the operating room in one of Cline's theaters and shows the installation of two Hallberg direct current economizers, each one delivering 50 amperes for a projector arc lamp with only 30 ampere line fuses on 110 volts. These economizers have been in service going on two years and are only two of several similar ones installed for the Clune theaters.

Thorndike Deland, secretary of the Chamber of Commerce, in Denver, Col., has had animated pictures of the city photographed and distributed among the various film exchanges. By doing this Mr. Deland plans to advertise the city. Moving picture advertising of cities is also being carried out in Des Moines, Iowa and Sacramento, Cal., by government officials. Different views showing the large buildings, business blocks, post offices and public libraries, etc., may be observed in these films.

ACTIVE ORGANIZERS.

Two Meetings of Importance To Be Held at Columbus, Ohio, November 1.

Two important meetings of exhibitors are scheduled for November 1 in Columbus, Ohio.

The Ohio Exhibitors' League will meet at the Southern Hotel. Every member of the league within the Buckeye State and every exhibitor intending to become a member is urged to attend in the interest of the general welfare. It will be the annual meeting. Many new and important topics will be up for discussion, after which the election of officers will take place. Arrangements have been made for a hall, committee rooms and all other accommodations at the Southern Hotel. The Executive Committee of the National Organization will have a meeting at the same place and on the same day.

Those that will be present are: M. A. Neff, president, Cincinnati, Ohio; C. M. Christenson, secretary; J. J. Rieder, treasurer, Jackson, Mich.; and vice-president, J. E. Morris, Cleveland, Ohio; F. J. Harrington, Pittsburgh, Pa.; Wm. J. Sweeney, Chicago, Ill.; Wm. Ullman, Detroit, Mich.; H. S. Dickson, Winchester, Ind.; H. C. Farley, Montgomery, Ala.; H. F. McLain, Wheeling, W. Va.; and H. G. Lux, Jr., Utica, N. Y.

The National League is growing, several states having been organized since the convention at Cleveland. The last State to organize was Minnesota. The organization there has resulted in a membership of fifty with Mr. W. J. Edwards, president. An opportunity will be offered at the meeting of the Executive Committee of the National League to exhibitors from states with no organizations to appear and apply for conferences with the committee. The latter will upon proper application be pleased to issue the necessary charters and attend to the proper representation of the newly organized states within the National League.

EXHIBITORS' ASSOCIATION SECRETARIES.

For the information of picture theater managers not already affiliated with local and state organizations the following list of secretaries of organizations and their addresses is published:

L. H. Wilk, secretary of Cleveland Local, Funland Theater, 105th and St. Clair Streets, Cleveland, Ohio.

Max Stearns, secretary Columbus Local, Exhibit Theater, Columbus, O.

C. J. A. Kyle, secretary Ohio State League, Lebanon, O.

F. J. Rembush, secretary Indiana State League, Shelbyville, Ind.

H. C. Farley, secretary Alabama State League, 5 Court Square, Montgomery, Ala.

C. C. Whelan, secretary Illinois State League, 4320 Cottage Grove Avenue, Chicago, Ill.

Thomas J. Barbin, secretary Pennsylvania State League, Roberts Building, 233 5th Avenue, Pittsburg, Pa.

W. Lester Levy, secretary Michigan State League, 302 Kirby Avenue, Detroit, Mich.

F. H. B. McLain, secretary West Virginia State League, Photoplay Theater, Wheeling, W. Va.

J. W. Clark, secretary Wisconsin State League, Idle Hour Theater, Sheboygan, Wis.

Since the convention at Cleveland the growth of the league has been remarkable. Locals are forming in a number of cities and state organizations have been started in almost every state in the union. A local organizer has been appointed by the national officers and a tour of the country will be made to induce all local organizations not now affiliated with the league to join. Organizations will be formed where none exist. The work is progressing finely and it is expected that a most surprising report will be made at the next National convention at Chicago.

CRUSADERS GOING TO ALASKA.

Tom Quill, manager of the World's Best Film Company, has sold the rights for Alaska for the exhibition of the "Crusaders, or Jerusalem Delivered," to a firm of promoters. It is expected that this wonderful subject will do a great business even in that frosty country.

The "Crusaders" was shown last week in Chicago by a Catholic priest to his congregation of several thousand people. Great interest was shown in the subject.

Reports from the Paul D. Rainey expedition to Africa are to the effect that the party has bagged an enormous amount of wild game and secured some excellent motion pictures of their operations. It is said that Mr. Rainey killed twenty-seven lions in thirty-five days.

Observations by our Man About Town

AT last the photoplays, motion pictures, moving pictures, or any other name by which you may wish to designate them, have forced themselves upon the serious consideration of the daily newspapers. Until quite a recent period they have been referred to by these papers as a most terrible agency for the infusion of criminal impulses in the brains of the young and weak-minded. Every criminal act, except those committed by the Blackhanders and the Chinese tongs, have been charged against the pictures. For a time the attacks upon them were so bitter that some makers and exhibitors feared that in the vindictiveness and recklessness a supreme effort would be made to have them indicted as instigators or abettors of crime. It seemed that no amount of reasoning on their part could stem the tide. The one object was to crush the pictures. Even public and widespread declarations by the People's Institute of New York City and the National Board of Censors that moving pictures constituted the "people's drama," were in popular demand, and by reason of the prices charged for admission and the educational features of the entertainment, they were a God-send to the masses, had no effect. Finally it was decided to let the attacking forces rave and allow the pictures to win out on their own merits, which they have done.

Developments of the past few days have forced at least one leading New York newspaper to admit editorially that the moving pictures have the managers of the other theaters on the run. The Garden Theater, which occupies a part of the Madison Square Garden building and heretofore has been the home of the higher class of dramas and comedies, has been turned into a picture and vaudeville theater, the prices being 10, 15 and 25 cents. This change took place last week and has caused no little comment. And simultaneously with this comes the announcement that the Kinemacolor people have secured a five-year lease of the famous Mendelssohn Hall, the home of high-class concerts, oratorios and other classic musical events.

These transformations have caused the leading newspapers to remind the managers of other places that they must give serious attention to the changes, as they demonstrate the development of a popular taste for cheap amusement. The people are clamoring for drama and comedy as much to-day as at any time, but they must be brought within their means. The motion pictures, rather the photoplays, fill the bill. Time and expense in their making is secondary only to the aim of the producers to win the favor of the public. The players are selected from the ranks of the best professionals, the supervisors of the productions come from the same source; the scenic and stage effects are designed and carried out by people equally qualified in their line of work, and the wardrobes used are equal to those of best theaters. In addition to this, it can be justifiably claimed that the plays in the pictures are frequently better staged than the best theaters could put them on, for the reason that the latter cannot reproduce the touches of nature that the pictures do. Add to all this the fact that the photoplays are now coming from the pens of some of the best playwrights and authors in the world and it can readily be understood that the "canned dramas," as many of the enemy have termed the pictures, have a Tripolitian hold that will not only keep them here for some time to come, but also cause them to grow stronger and stronger in popularity with people of all classes. The newspapers sounding the warning that the "people's drama" makes necessary a reduction, instead of a raising, of prices should be considered as benefactors by the managers of theaters and concert halls.

Exhibitors in New York have received another jolt from the Bureau of Licenses, which has issued a circular announcing that no person must appear on the stage or platform of any house that has a license only for motion pictures. Illustrated song singers must remain at the side of the piano on the main floor and if actors or actresses from moving picture producing studios take the platform, or stage, the license of the place will be canceled, as such appearances are now construed as vaudeville acts—monologues. The exhibitors have had big cards in the appearance of favorite picture players at their houses and feel this interpretation of the regulations keenly. The License Bureau informally objected to the appearance of the picture players last season, but made no positive prohibition until recently.

"Vell," said an exhibitor, "if der young ladies who haf been worrying me to death to get de nice young men and dem noble actors to my place vant to meet dem now dey vill haf to meet dem outside my house. I can't afford a vaudeville license mit my seading capacity und I can'd afford more seading capacidy mit my license. I guess I'll get up progressive euchres at my home und have der players dere."

Another exhibitor, who credits himself with a fertile mind, said he thought the new rule was drawing things a little too tight. He said it would be very proper to declare the appearance of photoplayers a monologue if they told stories or sang, but did not think the construction should be placed upon people who merely make a few remarks of greeting and appreciation. He looked upon such an appearance as that of a player or playwright who is called before the curtain, which is by no means a monologue. "Why," he said, "it is not an act at all. It is a simon pure advertising scheme for the maker of the picture, the player and myself. The people do not ask for the players to see them act. They see all that in the picture. All they want is to see some particular player of some popular make of pictures outside of the stage role, and when they are not in a stage role they are not performing." An official who heard this said, "That dope is all right so far as it goes, but we cannot make any exception. Such appearances constitute a drawing card which is, to all intents and purposes, an act that is not covered by the regular licenses."

"Aw, I've got 'em skinned forty ways," remarked an exhibitor who was asked how he felt about the prohibition rule. "I've been in de show business long before de license guys were born and what I don't know about laws and licenses wouldn't sell at a cut-rate auction house. Why, I've got dem now. Do you know what it is? Why, I'll slip it to yer on der quiet. I'll jess get Mr. Lovliman to come and take tickets for me for a night and der goils can have dere heart's delight as dey pass in and go out. Get me?"

"You may get some of the actors on that scheme, but the actresses might object unqualifiedly."

"Oh, I've got anodder card for dat. I'd make dem matrons and have dem keep dere eyes on der baby carriages."

A newspaper, in winding up a piece of sarcasm on the bombardment of Tripoli, expressed the hope that a moving picture man was on hand. The seat of war has not reported that one was there, but I would not be surprised if some company should come forth with a reproduction of the bombardment. At the Battle of Manila Bay, the presence of a moving picture man was not reported, but I saw a reproduction of the battle on the screen right here in New York, all right. At that time the pictures had not attained the high position they hold now and people were not as familiar with the resources of the producers. With most of them the pictures made a tremendous hit. I was at an exhibition of the "battle" when a man seated close to the lecturer became very excited. "Bravo! Bravo!" he shouted. "By gosh! but that is wonderful. But, say, mister," he exclaimed, addressing the lecturer, "how is it the ships are so small?"

"Ah!" said the resourceful lecturer, "that is a part of the picture more wonderful than the battle itself. Mr. ———, the proprietor of this company, had inside information long prior to the event that the battle would take place and had time to provide himself with, what he calls, a telescopic lens, which enabled him to take these pictures from a point five miles distant from the scene of the battle. That accounts for the great war vessels appearing so small in the picture."

"Wonderful!" exclaimed the auditor, resuming his seat apparently satisfied.

Advertising for Exhibitors

Conducted by EPES WINTHROP SARGENT.

IN a recent issue a correspondent asked the best way to get the matinee business and voiced the problem that confronts practically every manager. Very often the matinee business will be all "velvet," and again it may mean the difference between a slight loss and a profit. In any case, the live exhibitor wants to run his house to fullest capacity, and houses where the usher has to go and sit with the audience to keep her from getting lonely will not find a growing trade, since prosperity breeds and the full house becomes the crowded one at the expense of the place already slimly attended.

Some weeks ago we gave the particulars of a contest started by Montgomery, boss hustler of the moving picture exhibitors, but $1,200 automobiles as prizes are not within the reach of many and while the voting contest may be done with prizes of any sort, it is not well to start a contest unless you can afford to offer prizes really worth while. If your house is small and cannot hold enough matinee business to show a profit on prizes to the value of at least $100 per month of contest. It is not a good plan to use the popularity vote. Even with a large house and facilities for newspaper booming, the contest must be handled with care to avoid the slightest suspicion of trickery of any sort.

The Cumulative Prize Offer.

Perhaps the cumulative prize will be the best. The way this was worked in one theater in Brooklyn some years ago may be modified to suit the local conditions that change with each management and locality.

In the original scheme the prizes were portions of a china table service. A certain number of seat coupons were required for each plate, cup, saucer or butterplate according to size. These coupons might be all for the same matinee or for different days, but the coupons for Saturday were barred and these were printed on card of a different color to prevent their use. Certain essential parts of the sets were reserved for the "bad days" when the attendance was slimmest; Wednesdays, the downtown matinee day, and Fridays. To get these reserved articles the coupons had to be for either one of those days. This worked a hardship on some and the management had to be cautiously liberal in enforcing this rule, but it had a splendid effect on the afternoon business and it was found that many women who were out after sets brought in friends by the score, all of whom helped her with her set and then drew lots to see which of the party should get the next set through the team work of the little club. By the end of the season the china bill was large, but the bank balance overshadowed it.

Give a Variety.

But not every patron wants a tea set. Select also some article that will appeal to the single women and the girls. Get attractive stuff; not the cheap stuff that is usually sold as souvenirs. Base your expenditure on from six to ten per cent. of the admission. If you run two shows in the afternoon, as many do, have the coupons apply only to the first show. Let the second start half an hour after school closes and you will not want for patrons at the later show. Be frank in your explanations. Do not try to get credit for unexampled generosity. You'll not get that credit, anyhow, so be frank and meet suspicion with explanation. Tell them that you're not trying to be an all season's Santa Claus, but that you want to get those who can to come in the afternoons when there is plenty of room, that there may be more seats for those who can come only in the evening. Explain that the matinee is precisely the same as the night show and see that the statement is true. One house slaughtered its matinee trade because the proprietor's son ran the machine in the afternoon and they had a regular operator only in the evening. Suppose that you make your matinee price five cents and twice that in the evening. That doesn't entitle you to give a poorer show. Every admission ticket carries the implied promise of good projection and a complete performance. If you can't do it at the price, don't try, for the woman who sees a poor show in the afternoon is going to keep her friends away from the house at night; but if you give a crackerjack matinee it will help the night business wonderfully, for every patron of the matinee is a personal advertising agent.

Getting the School Business.

There are a lot of managers who declare that the law against the admission of children under sixteen unaccompanied kills their matinee trade. That is a short-sighted view of things. If only half the children come, each in charge of an adult, you'll get the same number of admissions and perhaps the men of the family will be sent down in the evening to see that funny reel or the wonderful feature film.

If there is such a law in your state, obey it and make your respect for the law an asset. Explain that it is for the protection of the kiddies and that you are as strong for their welfare as the parents themselves. You've not the slightest idea that harm can possibly come to them in your house, but the law is plain, you obey the law, and perhaps it is best, after all.

One live exhibitor sends over to the nearby public school each day a package of one hundred tickets. These are distributed to the twenty teachers and each gives to the five best behaved pupils one of the slips. These read:

This Ticket Is Awarded for GOOD BEHAVIOR.

It is good for two children at the 4:30 matinee on the day stamped, only when the children are accompanied by an adult guardian as required by the city ordinance.

PARK THEATER,
Main and Second Streets.

Awarded to .....

October .....

The blank is filled in by the teacher, not as a protection to the house but for the information of the parent. The color of the card is changed each month and the daily tickets are surcharged with a huge figure, giving the day of the month, to facilitate handling at the box office. The figure stamps are a part of the rubber stamp printing outfit used in lettering the sign boards, but where these are not used a set of figures and letters of reasonable height may be purchased for as little as 25c.

Helps Teachers in the House.

The teachers welcome the slips since it is an incentive to good conduct and the standard of the school has been materially raised. Not all of the tickets are used each day, about 80 coming in on the average. This means 80 admissions and 160 free seats out of a capacity of 483 seats, but it pays a direct profit in advertising and a lot of friends of the lucky pupils declare in on the guardianship of the prizewinner's chaperone and that difficulty is legally surmounted. Meantime, the teachers are won over to the support of the picture house, and although the house is in a purely residential section, there are four crowded matinees on Saturday with all paid admissions. On Saturdays the matinee program is changed. In place of the usual three reels of photoplay, there are the best two reels of the three and two reels of commercial educational. The two extra reels cost three dollars, but they pay a profit of several thousand per cent.

Extra Long Shows in the Afternoon.

The same idea of commercial reels is used in a different manner by a house which advertises a two-hour show in the afternoon for five cents and is packed to the doors from one until six. To the usual three reels are added three commercials. The reels are run at their proper speed to fill out the time, and the illustrated singer—who gives music lessons through the day—is not missed.

Special advertising must emphasize this fact, and many schemes may be worked in this connection. Cash register slips from nearby tradesmen can be honored at the box office in accordance with the amount of the purchase, or it can be arranged to sell the tickets to the tradesmen at a slight reduction and let them give them out themselves. In some sections mixed slips will be received, a forty-cent purchase at the drug store and sixty-three cents at the grocers being the same as a dollar slip from the butcher. Most cash registers have printing attachments, which simplifies printing and bookkeeping. It is best, as a rule, to stipulate that these redeemed slips must be presented before a certain hour, perhaps one hour after the house opens.

Be Careful of the Lottery.

Remember that the lottery law is strict and cannot long be evaded. You cannot announce that you will give every fifth or tenth ticket free, but you can sell five tickets for the price of four or ten for the price of nine, the odd ticket going to whoever gets up the party. You cannot give a brand new dollar bill to the holder of a lucky number, but you can give a prize in a contest dependent upon skill instead of chance. Suppose that a daily prize is given to the person offering the best solution to some simple puzzle thrown on the screen. That is not a lottery, though it amounts to the same thing if the problem is so simple that a child can get it, and the first slip drawn from the box is regarded as the winner.

There are scores of schemes along these lines that will bring business. If you've got a particularly good one, send it along.

J. H. James, of the Dreamland Theater, Salem, Ind., sends in a suggestion for a neat and inexpensive program board. On heavy white card, such as may be had at large stationers' or from some dealers in building material, have twenty-five or thirty sets of alphabets printed by the local printer. Wood type should be used not less than two and a half or three inches high. If desired, varnish these cards with some colorless varnish and then cut them apart, leaving half an inch margin top and bottom and a proper white space on each side of the letters. If you ask the printer to space them for you, cut as he suggests, using a sharp knife that the edges may be clean cut.

Build a back of heavy matched boards the desired size; box in with 2x4s and to this fit a glass door. Paint the back or, better still, cover with cloth of appropriate color and against this nail strips of tin or zinc, grooved by your plumber to take the cardboard alphabet squares. Paint the metal to match the backing or with aluminum and into the grooves slip the letters to form the words you need. Paint the outside and attach to the lobby wall. It's the same thing as many of the patent frames, and you have saved freight costs and builders' profits. The glazed doors protect the letters from damage and you have a sign that is, as Mr. James explains, satisfactory and cheap, yet presenting the finished appearance that does not suggest economy.

If you use a 2x4 for framing you can set electric lights inside, small 2 to 8 candlepower lamps hidden by the woodwork of the door, or you can raise the door just high enough to expose the grooves, using thinner material.

Try the scheme and send in a photograph of the result.

With the Western Produces.

Lewis Stone, Nat Goodwin's partner in the Co-Operative Co., took his cameraman and went into the wilds of Arizona after an Indian Snake Dance. Their guide was a young buck who couldn't even say "How" or grunt. Whenever they wanted to convey any information to him they had to draw a picture in the sand. One day something died inside of the camera and, after fussing around a while, the operator pulled out about eight feet of film, tore it off and threw it away. The Indian made a grab for it and adorned his head band with eight feet of celluloid. Lew has a tender heart and said, "Be careful how you handle that, Joe." Joe pricks up his donkey ears and says, "What's the matter? Will it explode?" After twelve days of drawing pictures in the sand! What's the use?

Chas. Insley, formerly of the Bison Co., has accepted a more lucrative job with Pathe.

While half seas over, Mr. Oliver, of the Pathe Co., was persuaded to have his hair cut. Said hair is about two feet long and is very picturesque in Pathe's Westerns. On getting an evil keel under him, he discovered his loss and sat for one hour under the manager's window cussing steadily.

Miss Quin, of Pathe's dramatic stock, has been featured in a big marine taken off Portuguese Bend. Manager Young Deer promises something unusual. To all queries the answer is, "Wait and see."

Pathe's "Weekly" cameraman was in the neighborhood for over a week. What he covered is also a mystery.

James L. McGee, the business manager of the Selig Co., left last night for Santa Cruz, where he will perfect the arrangements for some startling logging pictures to be taken in the great redwood forests just back of Santa Cruz. Mr. McGee has promised something good and novel. After the business details are settled at Santa Cruz, he goes to San Francisco, where some big marines will be taken.

Betty Harte has succumbed to a slight nervous collapse due to overwork and will not be featured in any of Selig's reels for about six weeks. Betty is the darling of the studio and her temporary loss from the merry-making crowd has left a trail of gloom a yard wide in her wake.

Iva Shepard has been forced to take a rest on account of her injured ankle. This is awful news because Iva and Betty were the life of the studio.

NEW ORPHEUM AT GRAND RAPIDS.

Out of a mass of scaffolding and débris and heaps of building material on Canal Street, near Michigan Avenue, Grand Rapids, Michigan., is rising the attractive façade of the New Orpheum Theater, being built by Messrs. Gilligham & Smith. The new house has a frontage of fifty feet on Canal Street and extends back one hundred feet to Kent Alley. In height it corresponds with the three-story buildings in the neighborhood.

With the Maxine Elliott Theater in New York City as a pattern, the interior decorations will be lavish. It will have a seating capacity of 1,200 persons and the chairs will be upholstered in green leather. As it is the intention of the owners to offer vaudeville with their picture program, an ample stage has been provided for. The picture program will consist of two first-run licensed productions of the feature class. In the vaudeville line it is intended to run six acts which will be supplied by the Western Vaudeville Managers Association. There will be three shows daily at ten and twenty cent prices.

The most minute details in the projection and proper presentation of the pictures will be carried out and the sound effects and following of the picture in its flight across the sheet with the proper music is a point in Mr. Smith's orders to his proposed orchestra and effect man.

Special attention has been paid in the construction of the new house as to proper and efficient ventilation. The Helios system of washed air has been installed and the Richmond Vacuum cleaning apparatus will clean the theater daily.

The new house is said to represent an investment of $75,000.

CHICAGO LETTER.

By Jas. S. McQuade.

HAS it ever occurred to the exhibitor that he is now receiving considerably less for admission than he received three years ago? I mean the exhibitor who is still charging five cents. True, he received five cents then, but the value he offered was much inferior to that offered by him now in quality of film service, in theater comforts and conveniences and in picture projection.

The purchasing value of the nickel has not increased; in fact, it has dimished. The exhibitor is now paying more for his service and more for his operating department; besides, the increased comforts of his theater represent an increased investment. The only thing that has saved him from bankruptcy has been, and is, the extraordinary and growing popularity of moving pictures, allied with the important fact that American manufacturers have the most extensive market in the world in addition to a well-protected home market, which has enabled them to turn out the finest film product in the world and to furnish that product to exchanges at a price that brings its rental within the reach of the poorest exhibitor.

Every practical showman knows that it is dangerous to raise the price of admission, but always safe to lower it. This reasoning holds when the standard of the entertainment remains the same, but not when it has been raised to a much higher level, as is the case in moving picture entertainment today. Every frequenter of a well-managed nickel theater today knows in his heart that he is receiving many times the value of the money he pays, and he will meet the inevitable when it comes—it may be with grumbling at first, but with genial resignation in the end. A mere comparison of values will convince him when in the right humor.

Viewing the problem from every angle, one is convinced that exhibitors can best regulate the rise in price by acting in concert. No man who has invested his all in a picture theater can take chances to raise his admission when his near competitors are charging only one-half of his price. It would be financial suicide, unless he has a vastly superior theater and a much higher-priced service than they could afford.

Local associations of exhibitors can do much to improve the conditions. Through them a campaign of education should be carried on. Some unthinking exhibitors should be reminded that a half-filled house at 10 cents per head will represent just as much money as a full house at five cents. And it should appear to every live exhibitor that if he raised his price to 10 cents he could hold at least one-half of his customers, with the understanding, of course, that his competitors also raised their prices to 10 cents. It should be borne in mind that the rise will make but a small figure in the eyes of moving picture lovers. They will come just the same.

Chicago and New York are backward in raising the admission price. Exhibitors in the smaller cities and towns throughout the country are steadily securing 10 cents. On the Pacific Coast the price is still higher. Among Chicago and New York exhibitors it seems to be a matter of "leaving well enough alone." Such a policy means retrogression.

Technical Film Employes Meet at Banquet.

A pleasant social gathering was held at Kuntz-Remmler's restaurant, on Wabash Ave., Friday evening, Oct. 13, when employes engaged in the technical departments of the Selig and Essanay plants fraternized at a banquet. Thomas S. Nash, superintendent of the Selig plant, and A. V. Steis, superintendent of the Essanay, were present. Among the invited guests were Schuyler Colfax and George A. Blair, representatives of the Eastman Company, of Rochester, N. Y.

During the evening several interesting speeches were made, in which particular emphasis was laid on the necessity for earnest, enthusiastic work on the part of every man employed in the technical departments. It was pointed out that a merely perfunctory discharge of duties meant decline instead of progress in the making of films, and it was urged that every man should devote the best that is in him to the turning out of the best possible product. The sense of individual responsibility for the nature of the results accomplished could scarcely fail to bring collective excellence, it was shown.

Charged With Using Mails To Defraud.

Thomas P. Keyes, of the Theater Sales Company, 211 South Dearborn Street, was arrested last week by C. F. DeWoody, division superintendent of the Department of Justice, on a charge of using the mails to defraud. Keyes is said to have obtained $1,000 from Edward M. Hagerman, of Clinton, Ia., by misrepresentation. Commissioner Hoyt postponed Keyes' hearing until October 19 and released him on $4,000 bonds. Mrs. Dolores Hayden, said to be associated with Keyes in business, arranged for his bond. Options on theater leases, represented to be actual leases, are involved in the case.

"Cinderella" Soon to Gladden Old and Young.

Miss Mabel Taliaferro, who has a stage "rep" sixteen times larger than her petite and elf-like self, is out at the Selig plant these days doing Cinderella. Never was child more enraptured with a new doll than is Miss Mabel with her first experience in moving picture making. It beats the delights of trouping and vaudeville all hollow, and she boldly announces that she has learned more in her five weeks at the Selig plant than she learned during all the years spent in the "legit"—that is, in perfect staging and stage management.

Wm. N. Selig has set his heart on giving a production of "Cinderella" that will be unique, and in Miss Mabel Taliaferro he has found a Cinderella who believes that artless simplicity best suits the character. The outdoor settings for the films fairly cover the spacious grounds, and stage carpenters and scenic artists are busy as nailers during the light hours, preparing the various scenes as they are needed.

I cannot say authoritatively, but I am of the opinion that "Cinderella" will be one of the great attractions offered in picture theaters the coming Christmas tide.

Chicago Film Brevities.

S. A. Dickerson, of the Anti-Trust Film Exchange, this city, who recently returned from a ten months' trip in the interests of the firm through Wisconsin, Michigan and Illinois, reports conditions very flourishing. Mr. Dickerson says that the increase in the number of houses over last year is remarkable and that the tendency is towards better and up to date establishments. It is worthy of note that Mr. Dickerson announces that fully 90 per cent. of the theaters in outlying districts are charging ten cents for three reels, and seem to be getting the increased price without any difficulty.

A pleasant call was made at the World office since last writing by J. W. Swain, Leonard Mohr and Judge C. C. Williams, all of Columbus, Ohio, of which city they are prominent citizens. These gentlemen were in Chicago attending the Brewers' convention at the Coliseum, being interested in the Franklin Brewing Company, of Columbus, of which corporation Mr. Mohr is secretary. Among other enterprises in which they are interested is the Pastime Amusement Company, Charles Kaiser being one of the four owners. Mr. Swain is president and general manager of the company, Mr. Kaiser vice-president, Mr. Mohr secretary and Judge Williams counsel. The company owns the Pastime Theater in Columbus, the largest picture house in the city, seating four hundred people. Pictures are in high favor in the Ohio capital, and business is prosperous.

THREE REELS A WEEK.

Carl Laemmle, President of the I. M. P. Company, Talks of the Moving Picture Industry.

Mr. Carl Laemmle, the president of the Independent Moving Pictures Company of America, is probably the busiest moving picture man in the world at the present time. Mr. Laemmle has recently returned from the continent, having traveled extensively in the interests of his vast business, and is very enthusiastic as to the future of the picture industry. While immersed in correspondence he found time to discuss matters to a representative of this paper.

"I am more enthusiastic today than at any time since I have been engaged in the making of pictures," said Mr. Laemmle. "I am so encouraged with the outlook that I am about to undertake a bold innovation in the way of increasing the output of the Imp Company. Beginning soon the Imp product will be three reels a week. The third reel will be comedy—high-class, acceptable comedy. We will also film a great many scenic, educational and historical pictures. With this end in view I have engaged some of the best moving picture talent in America and will pay the highest salaries of any concern in the business.

"The Imp producers are now working on a two-reel production, which will be a winner. I have contracted with one of the best electrical firms in the business for additional lighting facilities for double the lighting power now used, which will give us the benefit of the best photographic facilities possible. We are prepared to pay the highest prices for scenarios and we will engage the services of writers of national reputation in the way of film stories to the end that we obtain the services of the best in that line.

"I will not be satisfied until the Imp product is the best in the world without regard to pains or expense. Indeed this campaign is already planned for and we will forget all about profits for the next twelve months and the entire receipts will be spent in improving the quality of the pictures. The public can rest satisfied that the filming of an additional picture every week will not tend to deteriorate the quality of the pictures, for preparations have already been made to increase and improve the facilities of the concern. Additional stage directors, scenic artists, camera men and actors have been secured and the three reels will all bear the imprint of Imp quality.

"Moving pictures are more popular with the masses today than ever before and I can speak truthfully when I say that pictures are bound to become the popular amusement."

Asked about foreign conditions Mr. Laemmle said: "At present England is regarded as the best market in Europe, and I am pleased and delighted to say that Imp films have become very popular across the water, being shown in England, Germany, Austria, Russia, Italy, Spain, Norway, Sweden, Switzerland, etc., etc. In Europe they are now showing many pictures from 1,500 to 3,000 feet in length. I approve of the idea and there should be a great many of these extra reel subjects filmed. The European output, at present as it appears to me, does not elevate the picture business, as the subjects are often suggestive in character and it would be a detriment to the industry if such productions were shown in America. I believe strong, gripping dramas of say 2,000 feet will prove popular with the theater going public on this side of the water.

"In Germany no house changes its program more than two times a week and the best theaters change only once a week, running five and six reels. The prices of admission range from 12½ cents (50 pfg.) to 37½ cents (1 mark 50 pfg.). Germany, by the way, has made a wonderful improvement in photography within the past year. The leading producers are the Vitascope and the Deutsche Bioscope Gesellschaft, and they are producing some great pictures at present.

"The Western and Indian pictures have outlived their usefulness in Germany. No one appears to care for them and few exchanges buy them. In Europe there is a growing demand for scenic and educational subjects and I doubt very much if any theater of prominence does not show one or more of these pictures in every program.

"You can say for the Imp that we are going to have the best of everything and hit up a speed that will make our competitors let out several links to follow."

PRODUCERS' FILM COMPANY.

'Tis the Name of the New Concern in Which A. M. Kennedy and Harry Davis Are Interested.

As briefly stated in the Moving Picture World of October 21, A. M. Kennedy and Harry Davis have entered into an agreement which will culminate in the formation of a big independent picture manufacturing company. It has since been learned that the name of the new company is to be the Producers' Film Company and that it will be incorporated under the laws of the State of New York, with a capital of $300,000. The principal offices and studios of the company will be located in the vicinity of New York City, with a studio at some good western point as one of the most likely probabilities.

Mr. Kennedy is known to all readers of the Moving Picture World as the former manager of the American Film Manufacturing Company, of Chicago. His record in the film business is well known.

Mr. Harry Davis has been identified with the theatrical business of Pittsburg, Pa., for many years and has operated many large picture theaters, being thoroughly familiar with the business in all its branches. It is said that Mr. Davis represents large financial interests in this new venture, including many of the men who are associated with him in his several other interests.

At present the new company is in the formative state, so that nothing of a definite nature can be made public. Mr. Kennedy hopes to be able to disclose some of the interesting features of the company's plans before many weeks have passed.

NEW COLONIAL THEATER, ST. PAUL, MINN.

The New Colonial Theater, corner of 8th and Wabash Streets, St. Paul, Minn., has just opened its doors, with high class moving pictures and vaudeville and illustrated songs. Seating capacity, 700; 4 piece orchestra. The house is strictly union. It is under the management of Mr. Robert C. Groh. Mr. Groh is a veteran theatrical man and has managed quite a number of houses in St. Paul and has made a host of friends. His motto is to give the people their money's worth and do exactly as he advertises.

Motion picture films showing the life of the present day have been deposited in Wilkesbarre, Pa., in sealed packets, not to be opened for 100 years. If they're anything like the comics we see at picture shows around Boston, the twenty-first century people will think we're a very queer and jerky lot.—Boston Traveler.

Working the Sound Effects

BY CLYDE MARTIN

JUDGING from the tone of some of the letters I have recently received from different managers of the country, I am inclined to believe that they are looking upon sound effects as an unnecessary expense to the picture theater, or, in other words, they seem to think they are merely some traps for the drummer to while away his time with.

You will remember that it was not many moons ago when the little store show held sway, and in those days it was easy to separate the public from their money. But, thanks to some of the live ones, that day has passed. It seems but a short time ago that wooden benches were good enough and saw-dust was used on the floor. It has not been so long ago that an exhibitor would think he was taking awful chances if he paid the price for a new model machine. But those moss-backs are now a thing of the past except in the most remote territories and, if the old timers would "fess up" and tell the truth, they would tell you that it was the enterprising managers that came into the field and drove them to the tall and uncut.

It is true that you can run one of these so-called store shows by using an inferior film service, a mechanical piano, poor seats, etc., that is, if your patrons have seen nothing better, but what future is there to it?

The electric lines of the country have made it possible for the people living in the most remote districts to visit the cities daily and by a few visits to the larger picture theaters of the city they can soon tell you whether or not you are keeping abreast of the times. It has undoubtedly come to the time when you can't fool them any longer; you will be obliged to give them the goods.

Why, then, are sound effects not to be considered? Most of the effects on the market today are made in a practical way by skillful manufacturers. Do you think these large manufacturing concerns would put capital in their factories if they thought their product was a hobby or a fly-by-night proposition?

Sound effects are here to stay; when installed they will soon prove to be a valuable addition to any picture theater and will get the money. If you install effects, your first announcement and advertising of your innovation will pay the cost of installing in a few nights' time.

Some people have asked me, "Why should we put in sound effects when we are getting such excellent pictures and giving the public their money's worth without them?" That is what the old timer with his store show would ask. Allow me to ask: Why does Lyman Howe use sound effects when he has pictures made exclusively for his own use and has little fear of competition? Then again: Why did the management of Dante's Inferno pictures add sound effects when they have a set of pictures that people are paying a dollar to see?

If you have the idea that sound effects are useless, you will soon get this notion out of your head when the man across the street installs an outfit.

H. P. J., Wisconsin, writes: "I have been considering putting in a line of sound effects, but would rather go easy at first and add to the list from time to time. Will you kindly suggest a list of the most essential traps that would be advisable to start with. I have thought of adding effects and cutting out the illustrated songs, but may use both. I have a No. 1 piano player and I believe effects will prove quite a novelty."

Thanks for your letter, Mr. "J." Your effects will no doubt prove the novelty you expect and I feel confident that you will be repaid many times by putting them in. I think your idea of buying just a few traps and then adding others is a very poor one. We will say, for example, that you have a picture on the program the first night that shows a railroad train pulling into a station. You may possibly have a railroad imitation in your first installment of traps. Then suppose the next picture on the program shows a barnyard scene, the chances are that the rooster crow, hen cackle, and cow bawl will be the effects that you have expected to order later on. You have lost a good point. If you expect to work effects you should work everything, as one trap is as important as another. As I have said in another issue, "Don't do things half way." I know that you would not order a picture machine and advise the manufacturer to ship everything but the shutter and the carbon holder, that you expected to order them later. Why, then, would you order just a few sound effects? If you are "going easy" as you say, in order that you may see if it is going to pay, I believe you will be discouraged, for nothing done half way ever pays. Start in right and I assure you, you will be taking no chances.

Drummer, Cincinnati, O., writes: "I have been taking great interest in your articles in The World and agree with you that a person working effects should always be on the job. I look for little points in the picture and try to catch all cues, but there are some cues that come up that I do not know how to work. The one that puzzled me most was in the Selig release called "A Tennessee Love Story." In this picture there is a short scene where the old man is shown sawing wood. I tried hard to find something appropriate for this effect, but was unsuccessful. What would you have used in a scene like this?"

I am glad that you wrote me, Mr. Drummer, for I am pleased to hear from anyone who looks after these little details. Why didn't you try the original thing to get the desired effect? To do this you would not need to have a large sawbuck in the orchestra pit, but you could have scared up a small saw and a piece of pine that would have certainly gone good. It might be possible that you could get such a scene by using sand paper, but I believe the other suggestion is the best. If you discover a better way of working this effect, let me know, because it interests me. Thanks for your letter.

H. B. F., Los Angeles, Cal., writes "I have been a close follower of your letters on sound effects and I can truthfully say they have been a big help to me and my associates. I wish you would give me the addresses of some of the leading sound effect manufacturers that I may get their catalogs."

Thanks for your inquiry, Mr. "F." You will find a number of the leading manufacturers in the columns of the Moving Picture World. I am also mailing you a list of a few others I have found to turn out a good line of traps.

Manager, Memphis, Tenn., writes: Will you kindly suggest a list of traps that you would advise purchasing for a small show. The place I am to open will not justify me in putting too much money in effects, but I believe a few will liven things up."

The information you desire was published in my letter in the October 14th issue. In regard to your buying just a few effects for your new show, I would suggest that you read my answer to "H. P. J.," of Wisconsin, above.

T. B. JAY BUYS DANTE RIGHTS FOR INDIANA.

Mr. T. B. Jay, owner and manager of Pictureland Theater, Kokomo, Ind., has bought the Indiana state rights for Dante's Inferno, both Milano and Helios productions, and will push his new enterprise vigorously. Mr. Jay is one of the youngest of Indiana exhibitors, but has been remarkably successful in conducting a high-class picture theater, catering to the better element of the public. To talk on Dante's Inferno, Mr. Jay has engaged Mr. Albert Earl, the lecturer whose ability is so widely known through his lectures on Niagara Falls and Yellowstone National Park. Mr. J. R. Banta, formerly musical director of the New York Hippodrome road show, has been engaged as musical director. The engagement of these two able and experienced men guarantees that Mr. Jay's presentation of this great masterpiece will be second to none.

The moving picture show, properly censored and rightly conducted, as it is in this town, is not only furnishing a good entertainment at a reasonable cost, but in addition to that, it is performing a most excellent office for general good by ruining a cheap class of immoral plays from the stage—Hattiesburg (Miss.) News.

Sales Company Employes' Ball.

Social Success Scored by the Picture People at Alhambra Hall, New York.

"There was a sound of revelry by night and the Sales Company had gathered there its beauty and its chivalry" and all that stuff Lord Byron wrote, including the booming of the guns from without, said guns being the noise made by the frequent uncorking of Mum's.

In other words, the Sales Company Employes' Ball was held on the evening of Saturday, October 14th, in New York City at Alhambra Hall, 126th Street and Lenox Avenue. That it was a grand success goes without saying, as everyone in the trade knows that affairs of this kind conducted by the Sales Company employes are always remarkably successful. In point of numbers, perhaps, there were not so many present as there were at the previous ball. But what was lacking in numbers was made up in class, for, indeed, it was a "classy" affair and one that will linger long in the memory as a happy evening.

The cream of the Independent faction was present in person. All the well-known film manufacturers graced the occasion with their presence, with the exception of one or two who sent regrets. The gowns of most of the ladies present were one of the most pleasant surprises of the evening, particularly to those who came expecting it to be an informal affair. The majority of the creations were of truly wondrous beauty and one found oneself in a perambulating maze of aestheticisms. By 10 p. m. the function was in full sway, and the enjoyment continued until the small wee hours.

Stauch's Band from Stauch's Pavilion, Coney Island, furnished the dance music and between dances well-known warblers from the music publishing firms of Gus Edwards and the House of Laemmle dispensed the latest songs and ballads.

One of the delights of the evening was a handsome souvenir pillow that was given to each ticket holder. These pillows were of colored felt, laced with felt of contrasting colors and had the Sales Company emblem or trademark worked upon the front. These were in very great demand and highly prized. On the whole, it was the most successful ball that the Sales Company employes have given and it is to be hoped that we shall have another of them before the Winter is over. Boxes were reserved for all the Independent manufacturers included in the Sales Company agreement: The American, Champion, Great Northern, Eclair, Imp, Lux, New York Motion Picture Company, Nestor, Powers, Reliance, Rex, Solax, Thanhouser, Comet, Majestic and Republic.

Among those present were J. E. Brulatour, Harry Raver, Miss Dorothy Gibson, J. C. Grayman, Mr. and Mrs. Mark Dintenfass, Mr. Meyers, I. C. Oes, Carl Laemmle, Will C. Smith, Charles O. Bauman, Hector J. Streyckmans, Will S. Rising, Mr. and Mrs. William Steiner, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Evans, Mr. and Mrs. P. A. Powers, Mr. and Mrs. Herbert Blache, Mr. and Mrs. Herbert Miles, Miss Pearl White, Charles Simone, Mr. and Mrs. George Magie, Hugh F. Hoffman, Miss Edna Ellaby, Archibald Watso MacArthur, J. P. Chalmers, Sarah Wylie, Bert Wylie and lady, Mr. and Mrs. F. H. Richardson, Miss Agnes Egan, Mr. and Mrs. Edwin Thanhouser, Mr. and Mrs. George O. Nicholls, Mr. and Mrs. Lucius J. Henderson, William Russell, Marguerite Snow, Florence La Badie, James Cruze, Harry Benham, Mrs. Eline and the Thanhouser Kids, Jessie B. Badgley, Mr. McGill, Miss Helen Martin, Miss Cornwall, Mr. Frank Dear, Mr. E. Lewis, Mr. Gausman, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Miles, Mr. and Mrs. Garrett, Doc Willet and wife.

The officers of the Sales Company's Employes' Association are: H. A. Spanuth, president; H. L. Taylor, vice-president; E. B. Garret, secretary; J. R. Miles, treasurer; E. G. Brown, assistant treasurer, E. B. Deil, corresponding secretary; F E. Gribbons, assistant secretary; G. Ryan, assistant corresponding secretary; A. H. White, sergeant-at-arms; J. Lewis, assistant sergeant-at-arms. For the reception: General director, Charles Abrams; master of ceremonies, Charles P. Warshauer; floor committee, Robt. B. Warshauer.

Motor Drive.—Mr. Jno. Hafner, manager Dreamland Theater, Natrona, Pa., writes: "I have noticed several inquiries as to motor drives. I am using one I think excellent, though description will necessarily be somewhat lengthy. Would have sent same sooner only as you are somewhat opposed to motor driven machines and did not know whether or not you would care to give it space. My motor is a Kimble, ¼ h.p., variable speed, 110-volt, 60-cycle, changing speed gradually and not by steps. It is equipped with a 2-inch grooved drive pulley. I use an Edison, Type B machine. I first tried belting to crank shaft, but that required a reducer or a larger pulley than there is room for. I next belted to flywheel, with countershafting under lamphouse hood—the motor on floor under machine. This worked O. K., but countershaft was very much in the way on machine table. Also there was vibration which showed up on the screen. Not much, true, but too much to suit me. I therefore evolved my present arrangement. Motor is on a stand (block of wood, I use), half way between floor and machine table so as to avoid long belt with its tendency to swing and slip off. Motor pulley is about 2 inches out of line, to the left of the takeup belt pulley on machine, but up front, next the wall so as to be out of the way. On top of block on which motor sets I placed three bricks upright and on them laid two thicknesses of asbestos. This deadens the sound and acts as an insulator. I fastened a block of wood 8"x5"x2" to the wall directly in front of the machine, but two inches lower than the takeup sprocket shaft of the machine, when frameup lever is exactly midway of its travel. (This would make no difference with machines on which takeup sprocket does not travel with framing carriage.—Ed.) To this block I attached two brackets 2 inches high carrying a shaft ten inches long by about ½ inch in diameter. On this shaft I place two grooved pulleys, one 7 and the other 2 inches in diameter. The large one receives belt from motor underneath and is placed on end of shaft which extends about two inches beyond end of block. The small pulley is between the brackets in straight line with takeup belt pulley of machine. Care must be taken, with the Edison machine, that the shafting on block and the takeup sprocket shaft of machine are exactly in line, or level with each other, when framing lever is exactly midway of its travel. This will keep belt just right regardless of position of framing carriage. This, however, works well only when it is at least 18 inches from counter shaft to takeup sprocket spindle. The takeup sprocket shaft must be made longer to carry a 4½-inch grooved pulley to receive belt from counter-shaft 2-inch pulley. (Could not the 4½-inch pulley be attached to side of takeup shaft belt pulley with stout screws or small bolts? Also it seems to me that the small countershaft pulley should be in line with the 4½-inch pulley rather than in line with the takeup belt pulley as you said.—Ed) Rigged up thus the drive worked fine, only when I desired to run faster or slower it was necessary to move speed lever and it was hard to hit the right speed every time. This had a tendency to cause sparking at motor brushes. I therefore sought and found another and better scheme for regulating speed. On the end of the countershaft next the machine, I fastened a 2-inch flat-faced pulley having a ⅛-inch flange. Underneath the shaft, near bottom of block, in line with pulley, I nailed one end of a 1-inch leather strap. I led this up between the wall and pulley, over the pulley and down on the other side. Thus I had a friction brake similar to those used on automobiles. I have my machine propped at both ends with a board the width of the table. This not only holds the table perfectly rigid but is also useful for a shelf. (I presume you mean the front brace-board attaches to machine table and to wall, and the back one extends slantwise to the floor?—Ed.) On this front shelf I fastened a piece of iron 2 inches square, with threaded hole in center to receive a thumbscrew. I next bound the brakestrap to a soft spring an inch wide (by "soft" I assume you mean something like a wide clock spring.—Ed.) fastened the end to the shelf, bending it around to make a sort of horseshoe. I had holes drilled through the center for the thumbscrew and the thing was done. Whenever I wish to change speed I simply turn the thumbscrew one way or the other and immediately get exactly the speed desired, without interfering with the motor at all. The whole thing works simply great. Provided the voltage is steady, all the operator has to do from start to finish of a reel is watch his light. I doubt if the arrangement can be much improved, except at large cost. It cannot be used on Edison machine with outside shutter since belt from countershaft to machine will interfere with shutter.

"I also have a scheme for showing titles, many of which are too short to allow audience to read them if run in usual way. I frame the title when threading, throw down the mica lid of lamphouse hood and open fire shutter. There is sufficient light through the mica to enable title to be read and it can shine on film indefinitely without danger."

The foregoing is excellent and we thank Neighbor Hafner for submitting it. True, I am opposed to motor drives until some scheme is devised to compel careless operators to stay right there at the machine when it is running. The tendency and temptation to "let George do it," George being the motor, is too strong to be resisted by many operators. The net result is not good. I disagree with you as to your statement that all the operator has to do is watch his light. As I have time and again pointed out, the matter of speed is one of supreme importance in really fine projection. It is often necessary to change speed many times on one film if the best there is in it is to be brought out.

Nice Little House.—H. N. Ranels, manager Electric Theater, Wausau, Wis., writes: "I want to tell you about our little Picture House. It is the smallest in this city, seating only 245. We run two machines—a Motiograph and Edison, both latest models. We take care of the crowds in fine shape. Our current is 110-V., 60-cycle, through Hadfield & Hall transformers, delivering 45 amperes at the arc. Throw a 12-foot picture 65 feet. Use two 7½ condensers. Have no trouble getting clear field and perfectly illuminated screen."

That's the kind of letters I like to read, Wausau. Up-to-date equipment, doing good work and proud of it. Keep it up.

Interesting Photos.—Mr. LaPorte, operator, Princess Theater, Tulsa, Okla., sends in three excellent photos and writes: "Enclosed you will find a set of photographs which may be of interest to the profession. The booth was designed and built by the operator of this theater. Size is 10x12x7 feet. Have two Edison machines. You will note my way of setting up. I use conduit, bringing my lamp leads through the rear line and my motor leads through the front line. About a year ago I noticed in the Department a device for preventing condenser breakage, namely as picture No. 1 shows, a 3-inch elbow in top of lamphouse. I have used this in different places under all kinds of conditions; several of my friends are using same, and I have yet to hear of a single condenser breakage. I open my doors any time I please and pay no attention to drafts. There is never a sign of trouble.

"Believing that this will be of value to many operators, I am sending it in. Went to some expense for photos, but believe I am helping quite a few by so doing."

The photos are worthy of more than passing notice. Unless I be mistaken, the pipe vent in top of lamphouse was our own idea, set forth in the Department a year or more ago It is most excellent indeed, but the pipe should be carried to connect with operating room vent flue or through wall to open air. A swing joint could easily be arranged so lamphouse could be moved over to stereo. This suggestion is not offered with any idea that there is danger of fire. There is none. However, city inspectors would not stand for it as you have yours, particularly with back out of lamphouse too.

As to the motor drive, I don't think I would like the motor placed as you have it. It would create some vibration in table and be very much in the way. I think you will improve matters in this respect by studying some of the other drives now being published.

In photo No. 1 it will be noted that a cone comes out from wall to meet the lens. Under certain circumstances this would be a most excellent arrangement and it is not bad under any circumstances. The lamp-lead conduits, as we see, pass from the cutout cabinet to the machine under the floor, which is altogether to be commended. The file for programs, etc., looks like the Princess had a real operator in charge instead of the throw-it-around-anywhere, Sloppy Ann sort we all too often find. What is it you have in the lower right-hand corner of the cutout cabinet? It doesn't seem to be an ammeter or voltmeter. Is it a meter? The connections, so far as I could trace them, make it appear to be the latter. That film cabinet (Fig. 2) is excellent, particularly the sponge compartment. I don't like its location, however. You are in error there. As placed, it is more convenient, true, but near the floor is cooler, therefore better for the films. That machine stand looks to me as though it would not be very solid. An absolutely solid, steady stand is essential to excellence in curtain results. What is the box for at the back end of machine stand? Carbons? Tools? Now LaPorte, don't feel hurt or offended at these criticisms. You have a really excellent room and things are well arranged. However, still further imprvements, as outlined, are possible.

Resistance?—Madison, S. Dak., writes: "Am installing my own electric plant in my theater. Kindly advise me as to whether or not I will need a rheostat in series with my arc. The current will be D. C. Have heretofore used A. C. from city mains and have, of course, used rheostat. With my own power, however, don't think I need one."

Inasmuch as you have given no information as to capacity, voltage or kind of dynamo you have purchased, I am unable to offer you much advice. Your electrical knowledge is evidently somewhat limited. I would, therefore, I think, advise you to follow the ordinary procedure and use a rheostat. It seems to be possible to run without one with outfits constructed especially for that kind of service. Probably yours is not, however. If your dynamo is of the 110-volt type you will have to use a rheostat; in fact, a rheostat will be necessary with the ordinary dynamo, I hold, whatever its voltage; presuming you have no other arrangement for taking care of the pressure.

Lens Focus.—Ashland, Ill., writes: "Enclosed find $1.50 for handbook. What size and kind of M. P. lens is required to throw 12-foot picture at 80 feet. What kind of condensers ought to go with it. Powers Five machine and General Electric Compensarc. How much amperage for 80-foot throw, 110 v., 133 cycle? Seating capacity 450. Population 1,200. Some house."

Turn to page 68 of handbook and figure out lens EF for yourself. Use an ordinary projection lens, any good make. Use two 7½ condensers. Length of throw has little or nothing to do with amperage. Amount of surface illuminated (size of picture) governs that. Forty amperes of 133-cycle current ought to give you an excellent picture. Even less may serve, as 133-cycle is the best A. C. we have for projection. Yes, that is a large house, indeed, for a town of that size. I note, however, it is a roller skating rink also.

Machine Trouble.—Savanna, Ill., writes, saying he has just installed a Powers Six and that everything went fine for a week. Then a ghost appeared. Also has trouble losing lower loop. Can make ghost smaller by moving lamphouse further back. Throw, 45 feet; 6½ condensers. The loop trouble does not occur on all films.

You haven't told me width of picture, therefore cannot say as to what focal length condensers you should have. Probably, however, your 6½ lenses are O. K. But are you sure they are that focal length? If you have a handbook, see p. 67. As to the loop trouble: disregard back roller and set front one so it clears sprocket by about two thicknesses of film. When the bracket is closed down, see that the spring holding it only touches the lower point of the casting (see p. 887, Sept. 23 issue). If it touches the bracket casting elsewhere, when same is closed down, bend it (the spring) so it won't. Be sure the collars at end of rollers are set up so as to hold rollers in place sidewise, so that grooves in rollers are central with sprocket teeth. Don't get them so tight the rollers won't turn, however.

Fuses.—The following is propounded by New York City: (a) Uses Edison machine, 25-ampere rheostat, 110-volt current; has 30-ampere fuses on operating room and 50-ampere fuses about 10 feet from light company's fuses. When there is short or any trouble the light company's 70-ampere fuses let go instead of the others. (b) What advantage is there in one 6½ and one 7½ condenser lens? Would not both same focal length be better? (c) A brother operator claims a fuse will carry any voltage without being tested for same. I claim they are made to carry limited amount of voltage same as amperage. (d) Use Electra carbons. When bottom carbon burns down to about two inches sparks shoot from negative lamp-arm. Lamp in good condition. No ground. At times whole negative carbon gets white hot. Much pleased with article on managers who refuse proper supplies.

(a) If you have stated matters correctly as to fuse sizes in the three sets, there must be something hitched in between your fuses and the company's main fuses. If you use fifty amperes, say, and there was a connection between your fuses and the main fuses using say thirty amperes, it would load the main fuses to their capacity and they might go before yours. If this is not the case, then, again supposing you have stated the case rightly, it would indicate a heavy ground between your fuses and the company's. (b) The equivalent focus of lens combinations is what counts. The e. f. of two lenses is ¼ of the sum of their individual back focus. (c) It depends on what is meant. Any fuse wire will carry any voltage. You may have a fuse the size of a thread carrying current at 10,000 volts pressure. The length of the fuse and the distance they are spaced apart is what must be taken into account, as the voltage becomes higher. The higher the voltage the longer must be the fuse and the further they must be placed apart. (d) I think you will find the contact of your carbon with the lower carbon arm is very, very bad. Clean it out and file smooth; then keep it clean. Carbon contacts should be kept perfectly clean. Otherwise they develop high resistance. Would strongly recommend that you get a handbook at once and study it.

Excellent Table.—Mr. Richard Foote, Archibald, Pa., writes: "Several weeks since, in answer to an inquiry as to what motion picture machine stand is best you suggested one of brick or concrete. I enclo e photo of a machine stand I made for our Olyphant Theater. By no stretch of the imagination can I figure where or how a pier of brick, or of concrete, would equal it in any way. This table is made of structural steel (angle irons), with asbestos board shelves. It is bolted to the floor. It is rock steady. Everything the operator requires is directly in front of him and within easy reach of his hand. The stand occupies little space. It is 10x29 inches and of height to suit conditions, of course. Every operator who has viewed it declares it to be the best and most complete table they have seen to date."

We are indebted to you for the excellent photo, Neighbor Foote. We are perfectly willing to concede the excellence of the table, provided it be made from heavy material. Our reason for suggesting brick or concrete was and is that its very weight insures freedom from vibration. It is so heavy in itself that it will hold a shaky floor to some extent steady—a floor which vibrates, I mean. Such a table as you have constructed, however, could easily be made from heavy angle irons and have considerable weight itself. Such a table would be better than the brick pier because it would be handier. Your reel-rack is in a decidedly dangerous place unless reels be enclosed in metal box.

Crippled For Life.—Mr. Thos. Brooks, Nevis, Cal., care G. W. P. Company, Canyon Dam Lamp, writes that he has been frightfully burned in an operating room fire. That he is now in bed and without funds, facing the future crippled for life. He has a Pathe "Passion Play," in four reels. Will sell for $10 per reel and guarantees condition of films so far as to say that he will refund money if even one cracked sprocket hole can be found in one of the films. Has a Motiograph No. 2 machine, with dissolving stereopticon, half-size lens, two arc lamps, electric dissolver. Offers outfit for $80, not including films. Mr. Brooks is, or was up to the time of the accident, a traveling exhibitor. I presume the machine outfit is not a machine and separate dissolver, but a Motiograph No. 2, with dissolver attachment. Mrs. Brooks, who wrote the letter, evidently wrote the best she knew, but did not make that point quite clear. I believe, however, it is as I have said.

Things to Swap.—Brooklyn, N. Y., wants to trade Edison machine and other things for a piano. This, Brooklyn, is a matter for the advertising department. Would be glad to help you, but the advertising pages are the proper medium for such things.

Overloaded.—Lumberton, Miss., wants to know why 110-volt, 113-cycle A. C. decreases in pressure when his machine is used on same. Says it lowers the voltage all over town when he cuts in his arc. The mains carry 1,800 volts.

There is a screw loose somewhere in your information. If your arc lowers the voltage all over town then the extra pull of your arc overloads the feed mains. This hardly seems possible if you are pulling through a transformer from 1,800-volt mains. Even supposing you get 110 volts from the transformer, use a rheostat and pull 50 amperes, that would only mean a very slight additional load for the mains, providing they carry high voltage. One thing seems certain, however, your arc does overload the mains. If it only lowered the voltage on your own lines then it would mean your own transformer or lines overloaded.

Motor Drive.—Canadian, Texas., sends in description of his motor drive. We would like further information. You say you use "500 feet of No. 32 wire, etc." What kind of wire, please? I suppose it is ordinary copper. Is that right?

Motor Drive.—Mr. P. H. Brown, Erie Theater, Hugo, Okla., writes: "Noticed other men describing their method of attaching motor. I get splendid results and here is how I do it. Have Edison machine, inside shutter. I use an Emerson variable speed motor, ⅛ h.p., 110-volt, 60-cycle, 1,650 r.p.m. Motor pulley is a cone with three steps, 1¾, 2 and 2¼ inches in diameter. Belt from motor to countershaft carrying a 12½-inch pulley on one end to receive belt from motor, and a 2¼-inch pulley on other end, from which I belt to a 2¾-inch pulley attached to takeup belt pulley on machine by two short, stout screws. Can get any speed from 46 to 83, but use 52 to 58 most of the time. I watch picture closely and if I want more or less I run it up or down. I want to see better projection and better conditions for operators. Have been in my present position 20 months. Supplies needed in that time: two sets tension springs, one new aperture plate. My sprockets, cam, etc., are in excellent shape, for I take care of them. I notice the chump in Chicago reads the department himself. Have been in the business 14 years myself and don't know it all, nor ever expect to."

Friend Brown doesn't explain how he runs his speed up or down. Presumably with a field rheostat on his motor. Surely changing the belt on the cone wouldn't work very well. He encloses a clipping from local paper praising a scheme he has devised and is using to illuminate the auditorium. Offers to send same free of charge to those sending plan of house and stamped envelope. Why not describe it in the department?

Managers.—Boston, Mass., writes: "Have read with much interest your article on the good that unions have done in the past and will do in the future. I and thousands of my brothers can thank you for the able way you have put the question of unions before us. However, before the real operator can come into his own I believe owners who do not manage their own houses will have to be educated into employing men of real, recognized ability to manage their houses. Up here in New England few managers receive to exceed $25 per week. Naturally they strenuously object to paying an operator as much or more than they themselves receive. The managerial standard must be raised to a point where they will be able to deal with really high class men. You have expressed your opinion of the operator of mediocre ability. I believe mediocre is a fitting classification for many motion picture theater managers as well. The Boston local union has put the new schedule in force. Reports show favorably. Scale is $25 for chief operator and $20 for second man. Managers sadly need someone to wake them up as you are waking up the mediocre operator."

Boston is right. I know "managers" who receive the princely salary of $20 per week. Rather a joke, isn't it? How much managerial ability, Mr. Owner, do you imagine you can purchase for that amount of money? It isn't a ditch you are having dug. You are not employing a man to shovel coal or spade a garden plot. Why, my dear sir, in a city you can't hire an ordinary hod carrier for that. And yet you place the management of your house in the hands of a man who can command only a ditch digger's wage. Is it any wonder we have imitation operators, shadows on the curtain and garish, poster-smeared fronts? Take it from me, Mr. Owner man, if your house cannot succeed in the hands of a man of ability, able to command and earn a decent salary, it can't and won't succeed under the management of one who has not demonstrated ability enough to laugh at on offer of $20 per week. True, it may exist and make something more than expenses, but if the mediocre man can accomplish that, a real manager would rake in the dimes with a shovel. Glad to know the new scale is meeting no serious opposition.

Thirty-three Cycle Current.—Mr. Harry E. Collins, Box 82, Gresham, Ore., is having trouble getting a good picture with 33 cycle 110 V current. Will some of the brothers in Buffalo, and elsewhere, write friend Collins, giving him such help as possible on low cycle current? Would also appreciate an article on handling of same for the department.

Wants Position.—Mr. F. H. Davis, operator, Second and Bell Streets, Beloit, Kan., who has been employed in airdome past summer, wishes position. Not less than $15.

Connecticut Law.—Meridian, Conn., writes: "Note comment on Connecticut State law (P. 888, Sept. 23 issue) regarding operating rooms. I have set up quite a few operating rooms and can say there is no requirement compelling purchase of same from any New York concern. Any room that fills the requirements of the law is accepted. The requirements are very strict, however. Here are some of them: (a) The room must be of sheet asbestos. Millboard will not be accepted. (b) Uprights must be of T or angle irons about ¼ inch thick; size 1½ inches. Uprights must be spaced 2 feet apart. Height floor to ceiling about 7 feet. Depth front to back 7 to 8 feet. Width (minimum) 6 to 7 feet. Asbestos sheets must be free from fractures and at least ¼ inch thick for walls and ceiling. For floors it must be ⅜ inches, laid on a solid wooden floor. National code must be observed in electrical matters. There is no limit to amperage in this State. From 25 to 40 is the average used, however. I am using a Hallberg motor-generator and as I know how to care for it I get good light and have very little trouble with it. I keep it clean, well oiled and the brushes and commutator clean and free from dirt. I don't overload it. If it does too much humming I cut down on the juice a little. There is a point at which it works at its best. If there is any heat it is sure sign of overload. If there is too much hum to it it is also an indication of too much load. Such sets must be watched and taken care of. I have little trouble with my machine. Why? Because when all is well I let it alone. A screwdriver, hammer or cold chisel is no use to a motion picture machine. The further away they are kept the better. They should be used only when necessary. Often I have not touched my machine for a month, except to oil and clean it. I keep it perfectly clean. When I get my show I run the films through, making note of all defects. Oftimes a film will jump. Do I grab a screwdriver and dig into my intermittent movement? No. Some films will run all right. That proves it is in the film and I look for the trouble there and remedy it. My motto is: let well enough alone. I might add that operating rooms in this state must be equipped with vent pipe leading to outer air. Gravity shutters covering all openings must be installed and be held by cord having fusible link fusing at about 150 degs. Fahr. Brick or concrete walls won't do. If you have them the asbestos must be installed inside just the same."

The brother writes more, but space forbids its publication. What he says about tools is correct except that the operator who cannot have tools near without being able to let well enough alone isn't fit to be in an operating room at all. Compelling the installation of asbestos inside brick or concrete walls is absurd. No court would uphold any such proposition, I am sure. Brick or concrete is far superior to asbestos in every way. I did not mean, in my comment, that the law required the purchase of asbestos rooms from any one concern. I did mean, however, that it is possible that some concern manufacturing asbestos rooms might have a hand in the passage of laws requiring them to be used.

Unique Motor Drive.—Below we show operating room of Arcadium Theater, Washington, Pa., Mr. W. P. Clark, manager. The motor is a Kimble, variable speed from 300 to 3,000 r.p.m. It has given excellent satisfaction. The picture tells the rest.

Billboard Explodes.—Oakland, Calif., writes: "After reading your strong article on newspaper accounts of film 'explosions,' it seems like a joke to see in The Billboard, Sept. 16th issue, the same old stereotyped 'Explosion on a Moving Picture Machine,' etc. The article is by the San Francisco correspondent. Evidently he has perpetrated the absurdity because it is easier to, parrot-like, copy from a newspaper article than to give his magazine real, live stuff from his own pen."

The clipping referred to was indeed a surprise. As our correspondent says, it refers to an explosion of a motion picture machine and plays on the "small attendance averted serious accidents" just like a regular daily paper. We have learend to expect such slaps and such asininity from the daily press, but we scarcely expected it from a publication supposedly devoted to the show business.

Lady Operator.—Wichita, Kas., writes: "I noticed recently mention of a lady operator in Washington, D. C. Well, the National Capital has nothing on our own city, in this respect at least. She is our cashier (Colonial Theater). She is also assistant manager. She relieves me one hour and a half each afternoon, besides taking care of all the books. The lady, moreover, is an excellent pianist and a very good singer. She has had experience on Edison, Powers and Motiograph machines. She knows every part of those mechanisms and can and does put up a good picture. She watches the light and speed closely. When she occupies the operator's post, her eyes are glued to the curtain, which is a mirror screen."

Our compliments to the lady and will she please favor us with her photograph? We asked for the photo of the Washington lady operator, but guess she is too bashful. Evidently you forgot to mention the fact that the lady also can sweep and bake a pie. We have had four very fine cuts of the Colonial on hand at this office for more than a year waiting for some facts to print with them. We wrote your manager last spring to send us a little write-up of the house, but he did not answer.

Position Wanted.—Mr. Earl Booth, 512 West 42d Street, New York City, wants position, preferably out of town. Has ample experience and is, I believe, a good man. Have not seen his work, but he is well recommended. Has New York license.

Thick Condensers.—Chicago, Ill., writes: "I note the fact that some condensing lenses are quite thick at edges, while occasionally one is encountered having edges almost sharp in their thinness. Which is better?"

Wright, a recognized authority in optics, says: "The point most commercial condensers fail in is that the lenses are not ground thin at the edges; nearly all manufacturers being too careless in this respect. Not only is a thick lens much more likely to crack, and more absorbent of light, but it is distinctly worse in optical performance. The lenses should be ground to as nearly knife edges as possible, being just edged down for fixing in their cells." Mr. Wright's word may be accepted as decidedly authoritative in such matters.

Wobbles.—Newark, N. J., asks: "(a) I set the star of my Powers 5 snug against the cam. After running about two reels it begins to wobble around. Had I ought to change bushings? (b) How can I thread so picture will be in frame? (c) Throw 87 feet, picture 12 feet, lens 6 inches e. f. What condensers ought I have?"

(a) "Wobble around" is too indefinite, Newark. Describe that "wobble," please. If shaft is loose in bushings get new ones. (b) If you use a light piece of film, i. e., a piece with a snow or other light scene, you can see edges of aperture through film when pressed down on aperture, provided you have incandescent light nearby. You can look through lens, if there is room. You can hang a lamp in front of lens when threading. Look back over department. Several months ago I described and illustrated the method of arranging lamp for threading in frame. (c) Two 7½ lenses.

Fan Motor.—Hannibal, Mo., writes concerning motor drive. Says a 12 inch fan motor will pull machine and take-up, provided commutator be kept clean and bearings well oiled. Doubtless it will, Hannibal, but a regular motor is much better. I note that you yourself are about to install a Kimble. Evidently the fan motor doesn't fill the bill.

Hardened Parts.—Santa Rosa, Cal., wants to know my idea of hardening star, cam, sprockets, shafts and gears of the motiograph machine, and if it is possible to do it successfully why it is not done?

For a long time the kinedrome machine has, I believe, been hardening their intermittent sprocket. The Standard American now hardens its cam pin and star glass hard. The Powers company have just, after long, costly experiments, found a successful way of hardening the intermittent sprocket and will soon be using same on their No. Six machine. Gears could not be hardened without enormous expense because they would warp all out of shape. I doubt if hardened shafts would be desirable. The trouble with hardening sprockets is the tendency to warp under the process. You see the part must be finished, ready for installation and then heated red hot for hardening. If it were hardened before finishing it would then have to be ground, and that would be prohibitive in cost. The same thing is true of the ordinary form of star. When a sprocket is heated it warps under the action of the heat, by any ordinary process of hardening. A sprocket, especially the intermittent, must be absolutely true. The Standard used a peculiar and very heavy form of star, which I presume overcomes the tendency to warp. The warping would effect the cam the same, though I know of no reason why the cam-pin could not be hardened.

Treatise.—We are in receipt of a treatise, or thesis on "The Radiant Efficiency of Arc Lamps," by Henry Phelps Gage. The work probably is excellent from a scientific point of view, but unfortunately is couched in such technical terms as precludes the layman from grasping very much of its import.

Messrs. Golden and Erb, formerly with the Nestor Film Company and later directing the manufacturing end of the Powers Picture Play Co., have broken ground for a new studio and factory of the Crystal Film Co., and located in the Bronx section of New York City.

"Marooned" (Pathe), October 14.—A sea story of the days when quill pens were used. The old sea captain was furious because his son, Matt, wouldn't go on the cruise with him, and disowned him. On that cruise the crew mutinied and marooned the captain. They bring the ship to the port where Matt is and he, innocently, ships with them. Later, Matt finds the truth, and when a train of circumstances makes him captain, he rescues his father, whom he finds vacant-minded. In a well-conducted scene it is shown how slowly, step by step, by help of this and that trinket which had been his, his memory and a realization of the situation come to him. There are some very interesting pictures on the film. And while the situation is not very vital, the film gives a well-designed and interesting narrative.

"By Way of Mrs. Browning" (Vitagraph), October 14.—There is behind this picture a fine idea, pleasing in its sentiment and adequately expressing the spirit of a very true poem, interpreting it in terms of life, which is commendable. The writer of the scenario utilized an incident in society life and showed how a young lady feeling the truth of one of Mrs. Browning's poems, used it as a means of breaking through a misunderstanding between her fiancé and herself. The first time she sent a white rosebud, and the second time a rose. She was willing to make the third move; to bend and ask for pardon; but the young doctor didn't ask for that. The situation is developed with much skill and to the end is handled to make a very pleasing picture.

"Outgeneraled" (Selig), October 12.—Bessie and her accepted sweetheart outgeneraled Bessie's father, who wanted her to marry a count. It is a society comedy in very pretty settings, on a yacht and also ashore. Papa's scheme to keep Bessie and Bert apart was to take her on a cruise and have the count come with them. Bert, disguised, shipped on the yacht as a sailor. The picture tells how the count was got rid of and shows many amusing incidents and pretty ocean scenes. It closes with a "married and forgiven" picture. It is pleasingly acted and the audience enjoyed it.

"Romance of the Desert" (Pathe), October 12.—The quality that makes this romance different from and better than many other pictures of the West is the thread of religious sentiment, on which the incidents (in themselves not very novel) may be said to be strung. The man delirious and fainting, fell by a heap of white bones in the desert. He was found by Indians; but when he recovered, his memory was lost. He forgot that he had a white wife in the settlements, and married a squaw. The first wife had given him a rosary. He knows what it is, but not who gave it to him. Later, he, passing through the settlement with his squaw, is recognized by his white wife. To which shall he adhere? He is married to both and both are standing beside him. He chooses the white woman. The religion that he had taught to the squaw prevents a tragedy. The whole situation is very well handled. It's a good and acceptable picture.

"Get Rich Quick Hall and Ford" (Essanay), October 12.—Hall and Ford are first shown as escaping from an institution, probably a prison, although the actions of the two suggest that it is an asylum. However, they soon show that they have the wit to look after themselves, and are getting much money by flimflam tricks when they are literally netted by the dog catchers for the reward the authorities have offered. The tricks and antics of Hall and Ford are not very funny. Get-rich-quick Wallingford buncoed bunco men for the most part, at least the people whom he duped deserved to be duped, while these men merely trick the credulous. The picture appeals to this reviewer as a farce without fun. The audience looked at it in silence.

"The Gambler's Influence" (Lubin), October 12.—The gambler's influence kept Jack from making an honest living in the first place. Jack had run away from the farm because of his father's harshness. Jack's sweetheart in the home village was very pretty. While Jack was gambling he forgot to write to Elsie; but when his last penny was gone, he remembered. His letter led her to think that he had made a good beginning and, as she had some money, she determined to go to him rather than wait till he could make enough to send for her. Meanwhile Jack being "broke" is preparing to hold up the stage. Elsie arrives and the gambler takes her to Jack's room. There he finds evidence that tells him what Jack is about to do. He hurries and comes to the pass in time to keep Jack from committing the crime. Then he starts him and Elsie on the road to happiness. The picture is interesting; there is sufficient freshness in it and the players are pleasing. Its chief virtue is that it is wholly romantic and not a picture of life, but a rest from life's realities.

"From the Field to the Cradle" (Lubin), October 7.—An industrial picture showing how the milk consumed in great cities is collected and distributed. It is instructive.

"Revenge is Sweet" (Lubin), October 7.—There was no deep or bitter call for vengeance. The deacon had two tramps fired from his grounds by the cop. He didn't notice the third tramp who, for vengeance, stole the deacon's high hat and frock coat and went about town buying beer and handing out the deacon's cards. It isn't made real enough to be very funny. The reviewer heard no laughter in the audience.

"Ups and Downs" (Vitagraph), October 7.—The ups and downs were experienced by two young newlyweds. He made $20 a week; she had been used to millions, but had been disinherited for marrying him. It pictures the wife's almost idiotic helplessness. Her exaggerated doings might be amusing to those who have had personal experiences of somewhat similar nature; but the reviewer didn't notice any evidences that the audience was enjoying it, except while Bunny was on the screen. It gives, however, a chance for some very pretty scenes.

"The Deacon's Reward" (Essanay), October 13.—The deacon is a very kindly, good-hearted old man and his nephew is the kind that will scrape and bow to a rich man, but be as mean as dirt to anyone poor and in trouble. The story of how the uncle took care of a man and his family who were most unjustly treated by the nephew, and how the nephew, breaking into the uncle's house to steal, was kept from killing the old man by this protege, is not wholly convincing, but the sentiment of the story rings true. The players are pleasing, and though the audience showed no great enthusiasm, it seemed to take pleasure in it.

"The Stage Driver's Daughter" (Essanay), October 14.—The principal feature of this film is the stage driver's daughter who handles the reins herself after her father is disabled by a gang of toughs and lands her lover at the claim office ahead of the jumpers who plan to take his rich find from him. The backgrounds are characteristic and the way the girl manages the horses as she hurries forward toward the claim office makes a thrilling picture.

"Making a Six-Ton Cheese" (Selig), October 13.—Here is a unique industrial picture, showing how a six-ton cheese was made at Appleton, Wis. The statistics connected with it are dry reading, but serve to make the matter more interesting. The cheese will shortly be exhibited at a dairy show in Chicago, after which it will be cut into huge slices and sold. It is valued at $7,500. In the language of the street, that is some cheese.

"Seeing Washington" (Selig), October 13.—A series of well-photographed pictures which afford an opportunity for those who have never been to Washington to see what it looks like in some of its show places at least. Naturally much interest attaches to Washington, and this short film will increase it rather than otherwise.

"Answer of the Roses" (Vitagraph), October 13.—A story of love and jealousy, with a sister succeeding in separating the lovers because she loves the young man herself. The deserted sister fades and is near the point of death when the one responsible for the trouble is stricken with remorse, seeks out the young man, confesses and he hastens home. The dying girl's life is saved and the repentant sister is forgiven. Red and white roses play important parts in the strong drama.

"Raffles Caught" (Pathe), October 13.—The thief was sharp, but the woman of the house was even more so. She detected him attempting to rob the house, beguiled him into her room and detains him there until the maid has time to secure the police. The settings are excellent and the action of the principal characters is good and in harmony with the subject.

"Guerrero Troupe" (Pathe), October 13.—A film reproducing the astonishing feats of a party of skilled acrobats. The acts are interesting and the photography, considering the difficult character of the subject, is well done.

"The Gambler's Dream" (Pathe), October 16.—A picture in which a gentleman, who appears to be losing at the Casino much more than he can afford, falls asleep and dreams that because of his losses he commits theft and murder and is arrested. The agony and remorse that he feels awake him; he determines to lead a better life. These dream pictures are seldom without a good deal of interest. This one is well handled and pleasing. The costumes are of about a hundred years ago, and the backgrounds seem to be in Paris or London.

"The Unveiling" (Biograph), October 16.—A very pretty and ably managed society-comedy in which the mercenary motives of a clever showgirl, who tries to capture a susceptible college youth, are unveiled. The youth returns to his senses and, in a pretty picture, to his old love. The story in many of its scenes, as pictured, is filled with human suggestion. Perhaps the mother's trick to make the showgirl unveil her sordid character is a little trite, and perhaps the effect of her desire to commit suicide when the only son, whom she idolized, refused to give the girl up, is not wholly fortunate. The picture has a good deal of strength. The reviewer heard one remark, "That's fine." It was just appreciation of a very good picture.

"The Maniac" (Lubin), October 16.—The audience laughed a good deal while this comedy-farce was on the screen. The maniac thinks he's the long-lost father of the society girl. He read an announcement in the paper of the girl's engagement, and this mentioned the fact that the girl's father and mother had been lost years before in a shipwreck. The maniac escapes, appears and claims to be the lady's father, telling her he's just come from the penitentiary. She believes him and there is a painful time for the girl and her fiancé. Mr. Johnson plays the maniac and manages to put fun into a situation that was very hard to keep from being tragic; perhaps that is the very reason why his acting seems so funny.

"At the Threshold of Life" (Edison), October 13.—This picture, produced under the auspices of the National Kindergarten Association, is a picture with an educative purpose; and, like a former Edison picture, "The Red Cross Seal," it tells a heart-interest story and a good one. The same players have leading parts in both pictures and do as well in this as in the former. It's a picture that stirs human feelings and affections.

"Making of a Man" (Selig), October 16.—Bertie was perhaps too much of a dude when he married the pretty country girl at the city boarding house. Her relatives came to the wedding, and afterward Bertie took them to a big pleasure park for a good time. Their doings and surprises kept the audience in delighted laughter. Bertie "touches" his new father-in-law for a hundred and, after the old folks go home, spends the next few months "playing the races" till his wife goes home and leaves him to his own devices! It is Papa who makes a man of Bertie. He takes off his coat to get Bertie on the right road and then takes him home to the farm to make him work off the debt. Bertie shows that he had "the makings" and turns out all right. The audience took much pleasure in it and had many a good laugh.

"A Hot Time at Atlantic City" (Lubin), October 14.—The very first glimpse of this picture made the audience laugh. The situation is perfectly stated by the first three scenes; they are short and to the point. It is handled from the start in a clever way and makes a dandy burlesque. Atlantic City was treated to a hot time by two tramps who had stolen a gentleman's clothes and who used the visiting cards they found in them instead of paying for what they bought. The owner of the clothes sees them and, as the "leader" reads, there are breakers (cops) ahead. The breakers overtake them, but the chase is long and full of rough-house mishaps. The audience kept laughing after the curtain had been lifted.

"Tommy's Rocking Horse" (Melies), October 12.—Little curlyheaded Tommy was plainly a prime favorite with the whole N. Y. outfit. He was left in their charge for a day and the boys gave him a good time, including a candy pail, which, with the heat, made him sick. No nurse could have been more attentive; they made the doctor ride like blazes, but nothing would make Tommy brace up save the rocking horse that he had long wanted. How Uncle the cook who made the candy, in deep contrition did his level best to make things right, and how Nellie rode to the town for the rocking horse, make a story of human sentiment that is pleasing. The audience applauded it.

"The Smugglers" (Kalem), October 13.—The first scene shows a little group of sailors making toward a sloop rocking on the waves just beyond the breakers. Mother and daughter have bidden them good-bye. The daughter, Rose, later is seen gathering mussels and is captured by the smugglers to keep her from letting the authorities know that they are bringing in Chinese. The picture tells in a very unconvincing way how Rose communicates with her friends and how, with the help of a revenue cutter, she is saved. It has a fine picture of fishermen handling a seine net; otherwise, although not without instruction, it doesn't rise very much above commonplace. It might have been made more speedy.

"The Fighting Schoolmaster" (Vitagraph), October 16.—The fighting schoolmaster was a Yankee in the South when Sumter was fired on. Between him and a Southern girl (Miss Story takes the part) there had been something more than mere friendship; but this was changed by his marching off with the Union troops. The war's last battle raged around the heroine's home. The schoolmaster-soldier saved her brother's life and the boys in blue, Lee having surrendered, carry the boy home. It closes with a love scene. The picture as a whole has some freshness; one doesn't expect too much of war pictures. It is well acted and the scenes are well arranged.

"Trailing the Counterfeiters" (Biograph), October 12.—The two funny sleuths, well known by this time, get into more trouble by interfering with real detectives who also are "on the trail." The audience has some hearty laughs, and seemed to enjoy the last few scenes especially.

"Josh's Suicide" (Biograph), October 12.—A rural character farce, full of good laughs and other good things. Josh had cause for complaint. He wasn't good enough for his wife. When the wife got Josh's letter she thought that he had "departed this life," as he said. He did; he got aboard and came to New York, where he was having a good time when Mrs. Josh and a country beau whom Josh disliked got aboard the same Fifth Avenue stage. There was many a good laugh in it and the audience liked it.

"Her Wedding Ring" (Edison), October 14.—Perhaps the villain pictured on this film is a shade meaner than other villains. He is such a pup anyway that he transcends conventionality. He forced Lulu to marry him by an action that was smaller than the littlest potatoes and then hardly drew a sober breath. The man from the East fell in love with her before he saw her wedding ring, but she refused to elope with him. Her husband overheard the conversation and it shamed him into becoming a man. It is an interesting picture, but the story is not typical nor even convincing enough to be vital. The photography of some of the scenes is very good. The backgrounds are not wholly in keeping, but the miner's cabin is truly made of logs. It is luxuriously furnished!

"Pathe's Weekly," October 17.—With very good pictures of the flood-disaster at Austin and Costello, Pa., the topical this week has a very excellent and pleasing picture of King George of England in Highland costume and also it shows some of the Scottish ceremonies during his recent visit to the northern kingdom. The Czar is shown also. It was on the occasion of the unveiling of the statue of Alexander II, and with him are many of the Moscovite dignitaries. The film also contains several pictures of a home in Colorado in which an atrocious murder was committed last week. Do not these cater to morbid taste? Is it quite commendable to use the moving picture camera for such work?

"Vitagraph Monthly," October 17.—The Vitagraph Monthly (this number) is mostly interested in sports and pastimes and is especially strong in aquatic sports, swimming races, motor boat races and the like. It also contains a charming picture of a pretty lady aviator and her monoplane; the last G. A. R. parade at Rochester, N. Y.; and some very good views of the Coney Island Mardi Gras parade of a week or so ago. The floats in the parade were very beautiful and worth seeing.

"A False Suspicion" (Essanay), October 17.—It is a character study of a spoiled young wife, irresponsible, irrepressible, delightful, even in her childish extravagance and ruinous inexperience. She was so terribly in debt that she didn't dare tell her husband. Her husband's friend found it out and she borrowed money from him. The husband overheard the conversation when she was making a repayment. This was the root of his unjust suspicions. The trouble was easily cleared up. This slight plot is developed with a great deal of significance and humanity and makes a very pleasing picture. The leading lady in this role is never less than charming and shows much ability in her portraying the little whims and self-revealing "ways" that make the picture live. It is a very commendable film. The audience seemed to like it and it gave the reviewer much pleasure.

"On Separate Paths" (Selig), October 17.—Every element in this Western picture that gives interest to it is wholly conventional. In its last act the sheriff recognizes a long-lost brother who has taken the evil path. Both have the same tattoo mark on the right arm, and when the outlaw is dying from wounds received in his chase by the sheriff's posse, the sheriff sees this mark on his arm. The picture has some freshness at the start. Both boys pay an old sailor to make the marks and when they get home their mother whips them both. The older runs away. To such as have not seen too many Westerns, the film will be not without interest.

Independent

"Mutt and Jeff Join the Opera" (Nestor), October 21.—Mutt's experiences when he applied for a fifty-dollar-a-week job in the chorus are very funny. A little later Jeff also applies and makes a big hit. The Nestor leaders are especially clever in the number.

"That Blessed Baby" (Nestor), October 21.—A delightful, but slight farce in which a baby is the cause of an amusing hide and seek race in and out of a railway car. The kindly old maid who had just adopted the baby chases the minister, a stranger, who had consented to hold it for a moment, and he, very anxious to find her and be relieved of his charge, is chasing her. It is very funny.

"Divorce" (Reliance).—The mother and the father of the little boy and girl can't agree. The father decides to leave his wife. He writes a note, places it where she can find it, and carries the boy away with him. The boy is left with friends while the father goes away to Australian gold fields. The mother gets a divorce and marries again. Years pass; the father is not heard from. The girl, Hazel, has taken her stepfather's name and the boy, Jack, has been adopted by the Browns. Jack and Hazel are visiting the beach together, but have not met. Jack saves her from the undertow and they fall in love. The day of the wedding, Jack's father returns. He claims the boy as his son. Hazel's mother recognizes him as her husband. Hazel and Jack, who have just been married, are brother and sister. The situation is terrible. It is powerfully interpreted and commendable as a sternly moral picture.

"Her Sister" (Rex), October 19.—The early scenes in this picture are set in or about an old farm house, and the human values in the situation are brought out very clearly. The older sister is home on a vacation from her city work. The younger sister has the washtubs and the churn to look after. She wants the big sister to take her to the city when she goes back. The older sister won't do this and some weeks later, the girl runs away. In all this part of the picture there is only one break from naturalness. It was by night when the girl ran away; yet the family horse had its head out of the barn window as though it were day. In the second half of the picture the story becomes very romantic, but it is not so convincing; in fact only a very strange train of circumstances could make it possible. The girl who ran away became a famous dancer and the fiancé of the older sister is attracted by her. In all this time the sisters haven't known anything about each other. The older sister is astonished to find who the dancer is. However, the scenes, separately, are perfectly set, conducted and acted, and are also full of truth. The picture is worth seeing for its many good qualities.

"Bill Pays His Debts" (Lux), October 21.—It doesn't look very promising for Bill's creditors. He happens to find a stray bear, which he brings home to his rooms. The bear does many amusing things.

"Henpecked Bertie Goes Fishing" (Lux), October 20.—Bertie's wife wouldn't let him out of her sight; but she went off to sleep and Bertie and a friend rigged up a dummy to hold the fishing rod, and he and his friend slipped away to have a good time at the Casino. The ending is very amusing. It's a novel, laughter-giving farce, with pretty backgrounds.

"The Lovers' Ruse" (Solax), October 18.—The mother of the two pretty Bougow girls, full of aches and pains and very ill-tempered, makes it unpleasant for her daughter's lovers. So the first lover dresses as a highwayman and the second saves her; then the second dresses up as a black bear and the first saves her. Then both receive the reward proverbially accorded to the brave. It isn't slow; but neither is it very sensible or human.

"A Corner in Criminals" (Solax), October 18.—A newspaper story that happens while the circulation of the paper grows—that is one of the jokes of the picture which recounts the scheme of the star police-reporter to get Willets, an escaped convict. It is a rattling good burlesque.

"Three Daughters of the West" (American), October 16.—This picture opens with a fine scene. Cows are feeding in the foreground, and beyond them sweeps one of those broad, billow-like hills of the prairie lands. Five rustlers ride over its crest and try to stampede the cattle, but are beaten off. There is nothing novel in the framework of the story. The three daughters of the ranch owner are in danger of being captured by the bandit rustlers and are saved by the cowboys. There is, however, novelty in many of the incidents and these are shown as in places that overlook a grand and interesting country. It is well acted, as is to be expected, and makes an interesting Western picture, worth seeing.

"The Caves of La Jolla" (American), October 16.—These caves were made by wave action. It is a beautiful seaside scenic.

"The Lonely Range" (American), October 19.—The young man and wife had taken a homestead far out on a lonely part of the range and the wife felt the monotony of it greatly. The young husband, on his way to look up cattle, found a hurt stranger and left him at the cabin with his wife. When this stranger was rested and recovered, he departed, but carried the wife with him as far as the post-office. A friend of the husband, seeing the two riding away together, told, and the husband, not finding the wife at home, becomes an outlaw. Not till after he is arrested does he get the wife's letter telling him that she had gone home only till after the round-up. It is a well-acted and fairly interesting Western; but it doesn't deserve special notice.

"A Girl and a Spy" (Champion), October 16.—This spy fell in love with a Confederate general's daughter, but was caught in the act of making notes for the Union commander. One will say: Only a genius can save him. Genius ignores difficulties; that is what the producer of this picture has done. It has a quality that makes a certain kind of exciting—yes, and heart-warming—picture.

"Circumstantial Evidence" (Champion), October 18.—The girl sent away the two rivals and promised to marry the one who could make the first fortune. One becomes a cashier in a bank, the other a ranch foreman. Both write poetry home to Bessie. The foreman's employer comes with him to the city. There is a shortage in the bank and the cashier has to make it up. The employer of the other lover has much money and tells the foreman that if he should die it is to be his. The cashier knows the man has this money and shoots him for it. Before he dies he tells the police that the owner of the pistol in his pocket is guilty, evidently thinking that the thief was his own foreman, for he was carrying his weapon. The foreman is arrested and the cashier is on the jury that tries him. The strain is too great and the guilty man confesses. The story has to be watched very closely to be understood; but it is well acted. It is very interesting.

"A Lucky Change" (Eclair), October 16.—One of the qualities one is likely to find in Eclair pictures is good, intelligent acting; the players conduct themselves like human beings even in farce comedies. This is a farce comedy, but one that is filled with delightful human nature and has very good comedy in its situation. When the girl's father found that there was a young man around, he got a governess, one of the snap dragon kind who wore goggles. The girl induced her governess to change the way she fixed her hair and Presto! she was a pretty woman. Of course, Papa had to fall in love with the governess; of course, there was a double wedding, but in the way it is brought about there is much fun. It isn't a picture to make people roar with laughter, but it is one to amuse and please them.

"Uncle Peter's Ruse" (Imp), October 16.—Uncle Peter was a negro. His master, a Southern officer, was in the homestead and his presence was surmised by the Union soldiers who discovered a C. S. A. cavalry glove on the doorstep. Uncle Peter's ruse was this: He gave out that the Confederate soldier had come home, but had died of smallpox. Uncle Peter, to make sure the ruse would work, ordered a coffin. The soldiers saw that this was securely nailed down. They left the room to dig a grave and the Confederate escaped. Uncle Peter weighted the coffin, which the soldiers took out and buried. The picture is interesting and amusing.

"The Aggressor" (Imp), October 19.—There is nothing pleasant in this terrible situation, but it is portrayed with great strength by three very good players. The prospector is so ugly that his wife determines to leave him. As she is about to go, she meets another prospector, who asks her for a drink of water. While he is in the cabin he notices that something is wrong, and the woman tells him how things stand. He says, "Let me be your guide," and they go away together. The husband comes back to the empty cabin, finds the wife gone and the butt of the man's cigar, and, with drawn revolver, follows. The stranger, meanwhile, has fallen and is unconscious when the husband reaches the spot. He takes the fallen man home, nurses him back to health and forces him to fight. The stranger's shot kills him. The man's wife then turns against the stranger. The parts of the wife and of the stranger are interpreted with much intelligence and are especially strong portrayals.

"The Lost Kerchief" (Yankee), October 16.—Marie had invited her friend Mable to visit her, but before she got there she spent an afternoon seeing Palisade Park. By chance, Marie's brother was there that afternoon and picked up a handkerchief which he thought Mable had dropped. He followed her all about the park, but couldn't be persuaded that it wasn't hers, and at length she had him arrested. His chasing her down the shoots and around the scenic railway was funny for the first few scenes, but soon became a bore. So much so, that the scene in Marie's parlor later, when the two are introduced, and, when all has been explained, fall in love, had lost a good deal of what, under happier conditions, would have been good humor. It is the same kind of a comic character picture as "The Goodnatured Man," of this same company, some weeks ago. As entertainment, it is so so.

"The Man Who Came Back" (Yankee), October 20.—He came back into the human family of men and women. He was a rich man's son and his weakness, after his father gave him marching orders, led downward through very unpleasant places. He was brought to himself by a little girl and her big sister, who were kind to him, a tramp. He asked his father for another chance, and made good. The romantic ending scene is pleasing in its sepia tone. The whole is well acted, human and commendable. It's a good picture.

"A Western Bride" (Bison), October 17.—The well-known peculiarities of Bison pictures will be found in this one; but there is no accent on the rough side of life. It seems to be, in general outlines, true to life in the West. Two generations live in the picture and it seems to have been the picture's intention to show a decided growth in civilization, while the younger generation was growing up. A young wife is forced by her husband's brutality to leave him, and becomes the mother of a child and dies. The sheriff adopts the baby, who grows up to be a likely young girl. The pretty marriage scene in the old sheriff's cabin, when this girl and a fine young Westerner are wed is seen by the girl's erring father, who is now a bandit, and it brings him to a sense of his guilt, and he decides to reform. The picture has much in it to be commended. It gives a pleasant impression. It is not especially artistic.

"A Warrior's Treachery" (Bison), October 20.—The early scenes show that the warrior is jealous and, a little later, when the braves are out on the war trail, he slips back unseen and abducts White Swan, the girl he loves. When her absence is discovered and the chief returns, a warrior is sent out to find him. This man is wounded by the abductor, who, in the fight, is knocked down by White Swan. This picture is competently produced and has pretty backgrounds. It is a very fair picture of its kind.

"The Yarn of Baby's Shirt" (Powers), October 17.—It's a yarn all right, but it brings out a peal of laughter. It's a story of a darkey pickaninny whose mammy made him a new shirt of thick yarn and when it was almost finished tried it on. She was called back to the kitchen. The little darkey brother needed string for his kite. He never noticed that the big ball he "swiped" was still attached to the shirt. As the yarn was fed to the kite the shirt unraveled, till there was only a band around the kid's breast, and the kid disappeared, went up with the kite. A farmer had to gun for the kite to get the kid. It's a winner surely.

"Delivering Mail by Aeroplane" (Powers), October 17.—Pictures an interesting experiment recently made by the U. S. Postoffice on Long Island. It is instructive and worth seeing.

"A Vaudeville Headliner" (Powers), October 17.—A clown and an acrobat give in this picture an exhibition of very clever tumbling.

"The Satyr and the Lady" (Thanhouser), October 20.—The artist was painting a picture to be called "The Satyr and the Lady"; he had a very pretty lady, but only a mechanical satyr which he thought unsatisfactory, so he hired a lower East Side peddler. The peddler's little half-starved girl (the Thanhouser Kid) is glad of the things to eat that the poor man's wages buy, but the job comes to an end. A few months later, the man, dying, writes to the beautiful model who posed with him, asking her to look after his child when he is gone. The letter is given to her while at a party and she leaves the gay scene at once to investigate. She finds the old man dead, and takes the ragged girl home with her.

"The Awakening of Jack Clark" (Powers), October 21.—"I'm tired of you; go back to your people." That is what Jack said to the little, trusting squaw whom he had bought. A white girl had come into the neighborhood. Jack gets sick of fever. The white girl won't go in his cabin for fear of contagion. When Jack awakes he finds that the little squaw has been true to him and has come back and nursed him through his sickness. Jack doesn't want anything more to do with the white girl. It is an interesting picture.

"The Town Marshal" (Nestor), October 18.—A whimsical comedy of American village life, with the village marshal and another veteran as rivals for the love of the heroine's aunt. This aunt didn't like the girl's sweetheart and played a very unpleasant trick on him. He gets even. There is a comic, blank cartridge duel between the two elderly lovers. It is nearly all amusing, and is likely to be a popular picture. The Staten Island backgrounds are delightful in setting forth stories in which such characters as these figure.

"The Temptations of St. Anthony" (Ambrosio), October 18.—This picture, by means of very skillful handling, makes the temptation of this saint, who had left his luxurious home and his feasts and fled to the desert in repentance, very effective, and yet maintains the high religious atmosphere that the story demands. The beautiful women who surrounded St. Anthony in his cave are not shown at once. We see first ugly creatures with long filthy claws and these are changed into the lascivious, soft, white arms. But we cannot forget the claws underneath and look upon them with a full realization of the horror in the truth of the scene. The picture in all its parts isn't handled so wisely. For one instance, in the picture of the conversion both of the St. Anthony and, later, of the woman who had been his mistress, the repentant one throws away his or her jewelry and the people grab it with seeming greed. Now these people are dressed and act as though they were Christians, except in this particular. The picture is well worth while.

"OUTWITTING PAPA"—(Essanay).

Reviewed by Jas. S. McQuade.

A laugh-raising farce comedy, "Outwitting Papa," by Essanay, is bound to give picture fans a good run for their money, after its release, which will be some time in November. It is the product of the Essanay Western company, but its story and characters are not typical of the West; they may be found in any section.

The title alone conveys the impression of mirthful situations and slam-bang action, just as it also makes one scent a series of love scrapes. It is a case of an only daughter, young and pretty, defying her father by accepting the attentions of a young man.

There is nothing against this young man, in particular, but he is persona non grata to the irate parent. The lover is fearless in pressing his suit and he has the temerity to pour his tale of love into the girl's ear, right beneath the open window of the old man's study. In the midst of their bliss the girl screams and the young man groans, as he watches her being slowly drawn up through the window, by the strands of hair over which he has rhapsodized.

Please remember that "Outwitting Papa" is a farce comedy and that almost anything—sane or insane—is allowable, in order to keep up the flow of laughter.

The lovesick damsel is still more harshly treated amid the interior scenes. Her angry father acts the part of a cyclone in her room, tearing photographs and demolishing bric-a-brac in an abandon of rage. While he leaves the room for an instant, the girl writes a letter to her lover requesting him to arrange for an elopement. She is signing this letter when her father re-enters. He secures and reads the note. Then he adds to it the paragraph, "If you succeed in eloping in three weeks, she is yours," and mails it to the lover. Workmen are then immediately brought to the girl's room and the windows and doors are securely fastened with steel bars. She is then locked in and her father carries the key.

Now follows the outwitting of papa, in which a severe toothache paved the way to his downfall. The dentist on whom he calls makes an appointment for the following morning. The forlorn lover happens to call on the dentist just as papa is about to leave, and unperceived by the latter. He and the dentist are old college mates. He persuades the dentist to permit him to act as his assistant on the morrow, explaining his love affair and showing how he intends to outwit his future father-in-law. The dentist consents.

The lover contrives to send his sweetheart a note, in which he instructs her to simulate severe toothache, so that her father may have her accompany him to the dentist. This she does successfully. When they arrive at the dentist's office, she recognizes her lover, despite his disguise, but her father does not. When the latter is placed in the chair he is given a harmless anesthetic, which keeps him insensible for some time. On awakening he reads a card placed in his hand, which informs him that his daughter and lover will be found at the home of the Rev. Harold Smith.

There is just a little rude handling of the insensible man by the lover, in the anesthetic scene, that not even farce comedy will permit. Comedy, be it ever so farcical, is so closely allied with laughter and light-headedness, that it must never be alloyed with elements that forcibly appeal to our sense of justice.

ANOTHER KALEM RAILROAD STORY.

Business on the K. L. & M. R. R. has not been very active for some time, but recently the operating crew got busy, with the result that more of those railroad pictures are soon to be released by the Kalem Company. Among them is one entitled "The Engineer's Daughter," and the picture fans who went into ecstasies of delight over "The Runaway Engine" will be more than delighted with this latest production. It is some novelty in the way of picture making to witness the operation of a railroad by motion picture players. Real engines running on a regular railroad, driven by engineers and firemen who are familiar with the job and look the part imparts a kind of realism impossible to any other form of dramatic portrayal other than the photoplay.

Some of the versatility of the photoplayer is shown in plays of this character. In this particular picture the man who plays the part of engineer actually runs the engine; in fact, the entire operating force of the K. L. & M. road seem to be onto their jobs.

Scene from "The Engineer's Daughter" (Kalem).

The story is simple: Jack Sinclair, an inspector on the road, meets and falls in love with the daughter of one of the engineers. His interest in the girl is not appreciated by the father, who turns the young man down. The lovers elope on a "speeder" and the father gives chase on his engine. You will be interested in this chase as well as in the ruse by which the elopers elude the irate parent by taking a sidetrack and hiding among the bushes along the right of way while papa goes tearing by on the main line.

The elopers then take the back track for town. The engineer evidently gives up the chase and is returning defeated when he sees a handkerchief lying beside the rails. He climbs down and picks it up and discovers that it belongs to his daughter; then he realizes that he has been tricked and that the young folks are on their way back. He again gives chase and is about to overtake the runaways when there is a "slide" and a mass of trees, rocks and rubbish tumbles from the bank overhanging the tracks, effectually putting an end to the pursuit.

In the meantime the elopers have visited the justice of the peace and, when papa finds them, the only thing left for him to do is to give the blessing, which he does.

Good photography, plenty of action and that singular fascination which goes with all good railroad pictures will arouse plenty of enthusiasm when this picture is thrown on the screen.

Work has been started on a set of films to advertise the city of Detroit, Mich. Besides the public buildings; parks and city departments, there will be included views of some of the larger industrial plants, especially some of the best known automobile factories.

THANHOUSER GETTING LOCAL COLOR.

Near Lake George—to be more exact, several miles north—in the wilds of the Adirondacks—stands an old blockhouse which is said to be more than two hundred years old. This house is at present inhabited by a family of three—an old man of ninety-five, his wife of ninety and a young man of forty-five, who, the mother says, is still too young to get married.

The house was also inhabited by the father, of the head of the family in possession now. The house stands in the locality described in James Fenimore Cooper's novel, "The Last of the Mohicans." When the Thanhouser Stock Company sojourned for nearly a month in this region to get a true setting for the production of Cooper's novel, they came upon this interesting trio.

The old man has never been in New York, nor has his wife, but the "young" son made the trip and speaks of his experience in the "big city" with considerable awe. He informed his inquisitive guests that he sat up all night looking out of his hotel window watching the excitement and listening to the noise of "the gay white way."

Those Old Timers.

It was very hard to make the old man understand about motion pictures. He had never seen one in his life and when it was explained to him that the Thanhouser players were at that very moment working on a moving picture production of Cooper's "Last of the Mohicans," he was beside himself with wonder and incredulity. The son, however, had already been initiated. In fact, he was enthusiastic and offered to assist the Thanhouser outfit.

He knew of a number of places which are said to be the exact spots to which Cooper alludes. Naturally the Thanhouser players were glad to avail themselves of his good offices. He showed them scenes, the natural beauty of which engendered a feeling akin to bewilderment. They were dazzled by this display of nature's splendor and beauty.

The directors and camera men eagerly went to work and staged amidst this scenic paradise a large portion of the "Last of the Mohicans," which is to be released by the Thanhouser Company Friday, November 10.

The exhibitors and the public will have this young man to thank for the authenticity of the scenery, and the fidelity of the reproduction.

"AUNT JANE'S LEGACY" (Lubin).

The fortune hunter when he searches for gold in the matrimonial mountains under the guise of love always has the well-deserved hisses of the gallery. In "Aunt Jane's Legacy," a Lubin comedy which will soon be released, two fortune hunters "get the hook" and love triumphs.

Aunt Jane, a wealthy old maid, possessed the fortune; her niece, Bessie Elkins, who lived with her, possessed beauty; Dick Worthing wanted to possess Bessie; Aunt Jane's nephews, Jack and Paul, wanted to possess Aunt Jane's money. Auntie suspected Dick Worthing of being a fortune hunter—which he was not—and she gave notice that she would leave her property half to Bessie and half to the best of her two nephews.

Scene from "Aunt Jane's Legacy" (Lubin).

Jack and Paul immediately set out to prove, each, that he was the best. Paul locked his brother in his room so that he might appear alone at Aunt Jane's. Jack escaped and arrived about as quickly as Paul. Then each began to show how thoughtful, unselfish and generally lovable he was. In their efforts they got into all kinds of laughable scrapes. Unfortunately for them, Aunt Jane was the unintended victim several times. Meanwhile Dick and Bessie were carrying on their wooing, not caring where Aunt Jane's money went.

Finally Jack and Paul made it so uncomfortable for Aunt Jane that she had to call in Dick, and that sturdy young man quickly threw Jack and Paul out. Aunt Jane revised her will, leaving half to Bessie and half to Dick. Orange blossoms and coupon bonds!

PICTURE NEWS.

The picture newspaper continues to grow in interest; there is no doubt but that the world-wide events as chronicled by the moving picture is one of the most valuable functions it discharges. To many people—especially the young—the newspaper has come to a secondary place and is used as supplementary to the picture.

To many others who have little time and sometimes little interest in the newspaper, the pictures have come with a new and larger meaning, opening up an interest in affairs of world-wide importance. The educational advantages which naturally accrue are deserving of notice, the writer having proved again and again that interest in the pictures has caused a growth in knowledge which increases the desire for further information and greater detail. The regular issue of the news film is now looked for equally with the regularity of the paper. If in the cities these appreciative results are shown, how much more so must they be valued in the rural and distant communities. Newspapers advertise the number of their subscribers as a proof of the popularity of their individual paper; no paper, however, has assumed the importance of announcing one million readers, while the picture news are seen by the tens of millions. Any single week's issue is of importance from an intelligent standpoint, as it is attractive from a picturesque view.

The most recent issue includes pictures of the raising of the U. S. Battleship Maine, a sight of which is sought for by every American. The launching of the Florida in the Brooklyn Navy Yard and of the Moreno at Camden, N. J., are both events of international importance. The Zeppelin airship in Germany and the Hellen record flight in Paris are events which chronicle the latest successes in aviation. A great oil-well fire in Russia, a city block destroyed by fire in Philadelphia, with a meeting of fire chiefs in Milwaukee, where latest firefighting apparatus was shown, deals with one of the problems of the day.

The Sultan of Turkey sending his gifts to the Holy City of Mecca give light on that strange character, "the unspeakable Turk," tnd his—Mohammedan religion. London is represented by Lord Roberts presenting colors to a famous regiment, and France by a view of the harbor of Toulon, showing the battleship Liberté shortly before its destruction after the manner of the Maine.

Of course, no news written or illustrated would be complete without some knowledge of President Taft. His presence at the Michigan State Fair is chronicled by a series of excellent pictures. An interesting addition to one film was an exhibition of the firing of one of the rapid-firing guns at Sandy Hook for the benefit of the recent convention of governors, of whom about about thirty were present.

The loading and firing of the gun four times, out of which it hit the target three times, is most interesting. The disappearing action of the gun is also admirable. The weekly picture news is proving the most important attraction wherever shown.

ECLAIR WILL PICTURE "NICK CARTER" STORIES.

One of the features of the Eclair American product will be a series of the famous "Nick Carter" stories done in pictures. Nick Carter was a famous fiction character and his exploits as a detective gave the stories a wonderful vogue. The right to use the name in pictures has been secured by the Eclair Company and, though a number of pictures based on these stories have already been issued by that company, the American product, it is claimed, will be quite different in character and an improvement over anything of the kind that has been done before.

Ranch owners in Oregon claim it is very hard to obtain the services of cowboys nowadays on account ot the great demand for them by the film manufacturers.

"HIS DRESS SHIRT."

A Pleasing Comedy for an Early Release by the Imp Company.

"His Dress Shirt," a forthcoming release of the Imp Company, is a comedy that will be enjoyed by all classes, as it is a little tale of domestic life which rings true and the incidents will be recognized at once by heads of households. In short it is a story of a quarrel which ends with a laugh and the situations are ludicrous in the extreme. The trials and tribulations of a young wife, who is a novice in many of the duties of a housewife, who attempts to please her exacting husband, furnish the theme and the comedy is well worked out and staged. A young husband is invited to a "stag" dinner, which is quite an important function in the way of business and pleasure. Unfortunately he has only one dress shirt, and that is soiled, and he is at once exorcised. He cautions his wife to send the garment to the laundry and be sure and have it delivered in time for the dinner. The wife—like many another—had only the kindliest intentions and the welfare of her husband at heart, but she received an invitation to go motoring with a friend, and the shirt, the dinner and all else was forgotten.

The evening of the dinner arrived and the husband began "fussing." It dawned on the wife instanter that she had been remiss in her duties—had forgotten to send the shirt to the laundry. Right then and there she becomes a martyr to household duties and begins to have trouble. Stealthily she took the shirt to the kitchen and essayed her maiden effort in the way of a laundress. The result brings the big laugh. In her inexperienced hands the iron becomes an instrument of destruction and the shirt is ruined—the iron burning a hole through the garment. The husband, his face covered with lather, intrudes and sees the result. The situation is so ludicrous that he sees the humor of it all and instead of reprimanding the woman he takes her in his arms—and they both laugh—a happy and satisfying finale.

SOUVENIR CHINA.

The Royal China Company, of Huntington, W. Va., is offering an attractive souvenir for picture theaters in its "Dutch Delph Dinner Sets," advertised elsewhere in this issue of The Moving Picture World. If you are thinking of using something to stimulate business it might be profitable to take a peek at this proposition.

MORMON TEMPLE PICTURES.

Some weeks ago it was announced that a complete set of views of the interior of the famous Mormon Temple at Salt Lake City, Utah, had been surreptitiously taken and that the world was about to see, for the first time, the beauties of that carefully guarded edifice. For a time the newspapers were full of stories regarding the taking of these pictures. It was stated by President Smith, of the Mormon Church, that an attempt had been made to levy blackmail upon the church by the persons claiming to have pictures of the interior of the temple, but that he proposed to frustrate the designs of those persons by giving to the public a complete and genuine set of pictures of the interior of that edifice.

President Smith has made good his promise. Contracts have been made with the Levi Company, of New York City, to reproduce on slides the complete series of genuine views of the temple. The photographs are described as being the finest possible to produce. As they were taken under the direction of the officers of the Mormon Church and as every facility was afforded expert photographers to secure these views, there is little room for doubt of their excellence. The views were taken by a large camera and all the wonderful and hitherto unpublished beauties of those sacred precincts have been reproduced with great exactness.

Full particulars regarding the number of slides in this series and the date of release will be found in the Levi Company's advertisement on another page. This series should make the greatest picture feature that has been offered to exhibitors up to the present time, and the Levi Company is to be congratulated upon their good fortune in securing them.

POINTS ABOUT 1912 MODEL MOTIOGRAPH.

The Enterprise Optical Mfg. Co. takes pleasure in announcing to the trade in general that their 1912 Model is now ready. The most important changes in the 1912 Model over those of former ones will be found in the intermittent movement or framing device, and in the full metal equipment, the wooden base board having been entirely discarded on the No. 1-A models of the Motiograph.

The manner in which the lamphouse is now mounted permits of the use of this metal board in conjunction with the lamphouse as a spot light, a feature very greatly appreciated by some of the large houses who have difficulty in securing a satisfactory spot on an extremely long throw. With the Motiograph lamphouse so arranged as to lower or raise it without disturbing the set of the machine as wanted for the picture, and by the use of a tin slide with a hole punched of any desired size, a very satisfactory spot can be had by dropping a tinted glass into the slide carrier with this tin slide and securing any color effect desired.

The makers of the Motiograph have also designed, and are now prepared to furnish, a full metal adjustable operator's seat, which may be fitted to all of the 1911 and 1912 models, and when not in use can be dropped completely out of the way, the price of which is $5.00 when ordered with a Motiograph equipment.

Another very strong move by this company is the furnishing, as an extra item, their well-known Professional Rewind when ordered with a Motiograph equipment for only $10.00 above the cost of the machine.

For those desiring to use a motor, this company has, as is well known, been furnishing motors for some years past, but they have now designed a plate with screws for fastening the motor to the lower half of the swivel at the top of the pedestal directly under and in line with the motor pulley on the mechanism. This plate is furnished without charge when the motor is ordered with the full Motiograph equipment, including the motor attachment.

An advance catalog is now being prepared and should be ready for mailing by the end of this week. This is free for the asking.

AMERICAN TO HAVE NEW PLAYERS.

The American Film Manufacturing Company makes the interesting announcement that several new faces will appear in its productions of the near future. This is right in line with the new policy of the American and the recent changes in its office force.

The American believes that the introduction of new players will inject an enthusiasm into its films not possible where the same troupe is continuously used. It is thought that the change will be welcome to the many users of American pictures, as there is a steady growing objection on the part of exchanges to the same cast every week. Exhibitors are complaining that the similarity in features of the leaders often has a tendency to divert business on the assumption that the patron has already seen the film. The American intends to be the first to recognize this principle and, in its efforts to produce the most acceptable line of films, has already arranged with several high-salaried principals. They are expected to take up the work very shortly at the company's Western studio in El Canjon Valley, California.

The American has made other important changes of late. Mr. R. R. Nehls, one of the best known men in the Western field, has recently joined the forces as manager.

The American has also added a new publicity manager in Omer F. Doud, a well-known Chicago advertising man.

The new building now being erected by the American promises to be a masterpiece of its kind. It will be situated along the Lake shore on one of the most valuable land sites in Chicago.

THE NATIONAL PROGRAM.

Considerable curiosity throughout the country is manifested in the program that is being advertised by the National Film Distributing Company, as our correspondence amply testifies. Are they in a position to fulfill their promises? Are the brands of film they advertise real and are they as good as they claim? So as to satisfactorily answer these and other inquiries, two members of the Moving Picture World's staff visited the National headquarters one day this week and were regaled with the view of about 10,000 feet of film of both American and European manufacture, and can truthfully say that some of it was well above the average of that on the market today and all of it was well up to the average. Among the reels shown were several from European manufacturers whose names are new in this country. As specimens of photographic excellence and general technique, these could hardly be excelled. These subjects also have been carefully selected as to their suitability to American tastes, and the stories were good and the acting and settings fully up to the highest American standards. While this could not be truthfully said about the domestic reels, yet we were agreeably surprised at the general quality, and those who adopt the National exclusive program will have no occasion to apologize to their patrons for the character of the performance. Next week we shall review at length such National pictures as we have seen and give some important details as to the personnel and purpose of the Company. We understand that B. E. Clements is handling the distribution of the films and that he has taken offices in the vicinity of Herald Square, New York City, where he will conduct an exchange.

A SONG NOVELTY FOR LICENSED EXHIBITORS.

There has been a very cute song written about Master Kenneth Casey, the well-known Vitagraph juvenile actor. In these days when the moving picture actor is coming into his own and receiving recognition of his work from the public, this song which is entitled, "The Moving Picture Boy," will no doubt be received as a welcome novelty by managers of Licensed picture houses.

A former song which was published by the Vitagraph Company, direct, entitled "The Vitagraph Girl" and featuring Miss Florence Turner, was warmly received by audiences everywhere, all of whom were eager to secure copies of it. In the case of "The Moving Picture Boy," the personality of Master Kenneth Casey will at once arouse an interest in it on the part of the moving picture patrons, and no doubt the demand for it will be very strong, merely on account of his pleasing personality. But the song does not depend altogether upon that. The music is tuneful and catchy and the words are exceedingly cute and clever. The song moves along with a lively swing while the words carry an interest that is always pleasing, dealing with the life of a moving picture boy seen from his own point of view.

The cover of the song is nicely done up in three colors and shows nine photos of Master Kenneth Casey in several of his various roles. A large portrait of the young gentleman adorns the center of the cover as will be seen by referring to page 301, where the song is advertised this week. There is also a facsmile of the chorus, music and words, and piano players are advised to run it over, after which they will find that the song contains merits of its own. The song is published by M. A. Casey at 2897 Fulton Street, Brooklyn, N. Y. These copies are to be sold to houses showing licensed film at the rate of $6 in hundred lots and $5 in 500 lots, and judging by the popularity of the "Vitagraph Girl" song, it will undoubtedly prove a bigger seller and a money maker for any of those who offer it for sale.

MORMON CHURCH PICTURES

Released Saturday, October 21st

First genuine pictures ever taken showing the interior of the Mormon Temple at Salt Lake City, Utah.

The wide newspaper and magazine publicity given the subject recently and the maddening desire on the part of the public to see it, makes this one of the biggest attractions ever produced.

No religious sect ever guarded its rituals more closely than the Mormon Church and no Gentile has ever been permitted to enter the portals of their temple. Therefore, in this great set of slides, we offer you a veritable sensation that will pack your house.

Taken by expert photographers, they show every detail and every slide carries a caption describing the picture in full.

40 slides - -	$40.00	40 slides rented for one week -	$20.00
25 slides - -	$25.00	25 slides rented for one week -	$12.50

Deposit of full amount required on rental orders. Full sheet posters free.

INQUIRIES

Correspondents are advised that no attention will be paid inquiries which do not give the name and address of the writers. For the purpose of reply, initials or noms de plume may be used.

Inquiry as to the private affairs of photoplayers will not be answered. This includes the question as to whether or not they are married.

No inquiries of a general nature will hereafter be answered by mail and only in special cases when a stamped self-addressed envelope is enclosed. Many correspondents ask the same question and we have initiated this department to save our own time and yet help out our readers when we can.

READER.—We have no information in the matter, but will look it up.

L. M. J.—Since the lady is in the Biograph company, we presume that her name is Jane Doe. It is the best that can be done.

A SUBSCRIBER.—Why not get something more original for a nom de plume? It was Leo Delaney, and not Maurice Costello, who played the lead in the Vitagraph's "The Stumbling Block." They look very much alike, so your indecision is not remarkable.

JAMES M.—Spike, in "Spike Shannon's Last Fight," was not a prize fighter at all, but Gilbert M. Anderson, who is a pretty promising white hope, only he has more fun playing sheriff with the Essanay players.

O. L. G.—The sum of our investigation appears to be that some Lubin films are seen at the Proctor houses and some at Keith's, but which and when and where, no man knoweth at present. The sixth release and the split of Keith & Proctor, appears to have muddled the matter of schedules.

MISS EMMA B.—Miss Violet Hemming is at present appearing under the management of Liebler & Co. in "The Deep Purple." Address her in care of The Deep Purple Co., Theater, Chicago, Ill.

M. B.—The National Company does not reply to our inquiry, but it does not appear that their program is being used in this city.

T. B.—Why not write the company direct, stating what you want. The address may be obtained from their advertisement in this issue.

H. J. R.—We cannot obtain the names of the scenario authors you ask for.

INDIGNANT.—Three reels in half an hour is six minutes slower than we have seen it done. But you don't have to go to the hurry up house. Seek some more satisfying theater.

AUTHOR.—We must courteously decline to consider scenarios.

PUZZLED.—This is an easy one. When the Vitagraph made but three releases a week you stood one chance in three of getting Miss Turner as one of the players. Now it is five to one that you get one of the other releases. Miss Turner works as hard as she can. She is not dead, but on the contrary, very much alive, and the busiest little woman in the busy Vitagraph studios.

ADMIRER.—No. John Bunny is not dead, report to the contrary notwithstanding. Miss Turner, Miss Lawrence, Miss Pickford, Miss Gauntier and Miss Joyce are all alive and there have been no funerals for Messrs. Costello, Delaney, Johnson, Moore or others. So far as we know, Miss Leonard has not yet become connected with any studio.

BELLE.—H. M. B., L. E. S., G. C. K., K. S., E. S. L., A. E. C. and others, are referred to the above.

N. D. C.—See reply to L. M. J.

BUD.—Lottie Briscoe was the Helen of "Getting Sister Married." (2) She is not now in the Essanay employ, but is reported by that company to be in Philadelphia, but whether with the Lubin company or not is not stated.

BESS.—Jack Standing took the lead in "A Good Turn." (2) We presume his photograph may be had of the Lubin Company. (3) See answer to Admirer.

J. K. E.—Duplication of titles is not infrequent nor is it confined to the use of the same title by one each of the independent and licensed companies. "Swat the Fly" was done by Selig and Essanay within a month, and records for the last year show many similar instances. A title alone may not be copyrighted. It is merely the identification of some literary production or work of art which has been copyrighted. There are some rights in common law but none in copyright law.

T. G. L.—The Thanhouser Romeo and Juliet is in two, not three reels. (2) We do not grade films according to merit, since that is merely a matter of opinion, but the film can hold its own in any company.

N. G. P.—Charles Kent was the farmer in the Vitagraph's "The Ninety and Nine." The chin whisker shows that a really admirable actor can rise superior to what is generally regarded as a comedy make up. As a matter of fact it was not a comedy make up, but a perfectly proper facial dressing of the part.

G. M. W.—The Pearl in "Helping Him Out," was Pearl White. She is not now with the Lubin company. (2) Eleanor Caines has not been with the same company for some time. We believe that she is playing in stock. (3) Harry Coleman was playing in vaudeville the last we heard. (4) See answer to Admirer.

E. E. T.—It is useless to apply for work as a photoplayer unless you can show experience. This was not always so, but now a sufficiently wide choice is offered from among the competent players although stage experience is accepted by some companies in lieu of work before the camera.

VERA.—The Costello children in the Vitagraph pictures are the little daughters of Maurice Costello, but they are not related in any way to Miss Turner. Other questions are barred.

M. P. P.—Sydney Ayres had the lead in "The Heart of John Barlow." It is a Selig film. (2) The "black diamond" you speak of is the Selig trademark. Its use makes the duplication of the film by unauthorized parties a serious offense. (3) The animals used in the Selig pictures are the property of that company. (4) See answer to Admirer above.

W. W. O.—Guy Coombs is no longer with the Edison company. (2) Edwin August is said to be with the Biograph. (3) Something more than a good stage presence and an ability to ride horseback is required of a photoplayer. Better give up the idea. The western companies are not using New York riders.

J. S.—The jumps in the pictures are probably caused by the patches. The film is torn or broken and a few pictures are removed in making a joint. This causes the players to appear to jump forward a step or two to where the omitted action brings the figure. It is annoying to the spectator but you can scarcely ask the exchanges to throw away a $90 film merely because of a couple of patches.

C. S. B.—We are not yet advised as to Miss Pickford's successor in the Imp company.

BEN.—Miss Edna Payne was the second girl in Lubin's "Higginses vs. Judsons." Arthur Johnson and Harry Myers were the men. (2) We are not aware that Miss Turner has a sister in the Vitagraph company. (3) Miss Storey is not a southern girl, but claims New York as her home. (4) See answer to Admirer.

O. T.—Miss Laura Sawyer was the Claire in Edison's "The Ironmaster." (2) We are not aware that anyone ever starred in the play, but it has found a place in the repertoire of many famous players. It was a favorite with Mr. and Mrs. Kendall in their tours of this country.

B. T. R.—Miss Alice Joyce had the lead in "An Indian Maid's Sacrifice." (2) She was not a member of the O'Kalems, the section of the Kalem company recently in Ireland. (3) The return of that contingent has already been noted in this paper. The company will spend the winter in the South. Miss Joyce is out West.

I. A. A.—Harry Myers was the Indian runner in "Blue Horse Mine." (2) No matrimonial information. (3) Both Yankee and Pathe have done "A Close Call" within the year. Which do you mean?

J. L. H.—Texas Nell in Melies' "Jack Wilson's Last Deal," was Mrs. Storey, the mother of Miss Edith Storey. (2) The picture was made in Texas, before the company went to California.

N. I. O.—A special release is one not regularly listed. It is usually a topical film.

T. L. C.—The manager of the local photoplay theater is in a better position to give you this information than we are. A courteous inquiry will doubtless bring a courteous reply.

V. V. M.—Almost any company will be glad to use a trained horse if you can suggest some stories built to fit the horse's tricks and which have something more than the trick for a reason. It will be sufficient that you can offer the ideas. The studio will develop the scenario if the idea is good. (2) Most of the companies making Western pictures have their own riding stock. None work sufficiently close to you to make it probable that you could rent your string profitably.

Apples and Destiny

You have, no doubt, heard many times of the smooth city stranger who leads poor country girls astray, but perhaps you never heard of the rural maiden who was more than a match for Broadway Lotharios who tried to fill her ears with the honeyed words of flattery. This picture deals with the sad fate of "Algy," who came to conquer but received a lesson that he never forgot.

The Progressive Book Agent

Beware of the book agent, because for ways that are dark and for tricks that are vain the "Heathen Chinee" is only a novice beside him. A real book agent can sell any kind of a book and make you think you need it. This picture gives us inside information of the tricks of his trade as we observe him selling the same thing to a whole family.

The Pride of the West

In the sterner walks of life the difference between man and woman is the difference between the professional and the amateur. But put her to her own resources and she develops qualities of skill, bravery and sagacity that often surpass those of man. Nature endows woman with a latent fortitude that rises to great heights, and also provides her with an intuition to unmask clever rascality.

CORRESPONDENCE

BOSTON.

The Poli Theater, Hartford, Conn., has returned to "pop" vaudeville and pictures, after a summer season devoted to stock company attractions. Licensed pictures are used, and business is always brisk at the Poli.

The Reverend Herbert Johnson, the best-known of Boston clergymen, paid a great tribute to a Boston photoplay house—the Scenic Temple, one of the William Bradstreet string of theaters. In his regular Sunday evening lecture on current events, Dr. Johnson stated that the Scenic Temple was, without doubt, one of the best places of amusement in the city. A place that every mother could safely take her children, and one that Boston should be considered a model place for innocent amusement. Such a discourse, coming from so distinguished a source, must redound to the advantage of the Scenic Temple in general, and to motography in general.

Mr. Charlie Higginbotham, general manager of the Grand Amusement Co., of Holyoke, Mass., announces that his corporation has purchased the Elite Picture Palace of that city. Mr. Higginbotham is overlooking the managing of seven theaters, devoted to the photoplay. The entire circuit is doing very well.

Mr. Fred Windisch, manager of Poli's Theater, New Haven, Conn., has resigned the position, and is succeeded by Mr. Louis Garvey.

Mr. R. G. Larsen, of the Keith forces, will open the Colonial Theater, Lawrence, Mass., on October 16, with "pop" vaudeville and pictures. The Colonial should do well, as it is a very cosy theater.

The New National Theater, Boston, which is the largest theater in the world devoted to vaudeville and pictures, has found business so satisfactory since its opening three weeks ago, that a raise in prices has been made. The prices now reach twenty-five cents, with box seats at fifty cents. At the start, the prices were five cents, ten cents and fifteen cents. The National is a B. F. Keith house. The first pictures of the terrible disaster at Austin, Pa., were exhibited by the National on Thursday evening, October 5.

Messrs. Renton and Royce have been installed as temporary managers of the Poli Theater, Bridgeport, Conn., pending the definite selection of the successor to L. D. Garvey, who has left here to take charge of the larger and more important Poli Theater at New Haven, Conn.

A very welcome return was that of Mr. Louis M. Boas, the popular and efficient manager of the Bijou and Premier Theaters, Fall River, Mass. Mr. Boas has been sojourning in Europe nearly five months and has now returned in the best of health. Mr. Charles Benson, who has managed both theaters during his superior's trip, expects to take a short vacation. After this, Mr. Benson will take up his duties as assistant to Mr. Boas. Both Bijou and Premier are big winners, due to Mr. Boas' methods.

The Broadway Theater, Taunton, Mass., will not show any more pictures—at least not for a while. The Broadway has been leased by the Polo League, and will be used for roller skating.

M. C. Blumenberg, manager and proprietor of the Casco Theater, near Portland, Maine, has found business to be too brisk for his seating capacity, and has enlarged his cosy theater. The Casco has just a bit the better of the other theaters near by, due to the high-class pictures, and unusually talented singers on the programs.

Boston Moving Picture Operators' Union, Local 182, at their last meeting, voted to hold their second yearly smoke-talk and general festivities in November. The first affair was a tremendous success, and a repetition is looked for, owing to the increased numbers of the local. Mr. Max Goodman, Mr. Eddie McDermott and Mr. John Sweetman have been decided upon as the committee in charge of the event with the first named as chairman. In the future the doings of the Local 182 will be chronicled in these columns.

HENRY.

NEW ENGLAND.

Mr. Charles Baeny was presented with a loving cup by the employees of Hunt's Mills. Mr. Baeny has an important position with the Providence Opera House, and manages the "Mill" during the summer season, while his Opera House is dark.

Mr. F. J. Windisch, who has held the position of resident manager of Poli's Theater, New Haven, Conn., for several years, has resigned. Mr. Poli has not as yet picked a successor.

Mr. J. W. Barry, who recently took over the Palace Theater, Fall River, Mass., has installed A. W. Ashley, of New Bedford, Mass., as manager. The Palace has been doing very well since its change of owners, and proprietor Barry expects to make a good proposition with moving pictures and vaudeville.

Reports are circulating to the effect that William Fox is seriously considering the invasion of New England with his brand of popular vaudeville and pictures. Marcus Loew has found New England a very profitable field for his operations and it is expected that William Fox will soon be around.

On Monday night, September 18, the new Empire Theater, Rockland, Maine, held its first opening to the public. Attendance has been very large, and S. R. O. has not been unusual. The new Empire is one of the largest and finest theaters in Maine, using motion pictures and vaudeville.

Mr. C. M. Donohue, until recently manager of the Broadway Theater, Lawrence, Mass., has left, and was succeeded by W. C. Fleming. Mr. Fleming comes from the Lincoln Park Theater, Worcester, Mass., and is counted a clever and energetic manager.

A story is going the rounds among local picture houses as follows: William Austin, a 17-year-old boy of Belleville, N. Y., ran away from home, and landed in Boston. While in Boston, so the story goes, the boy visited a motion picture show, and one of the reels depicted a bad boy who was sorry for a wrong act. This preyed on Austin's mind and he finally decided to return to Belleville.

The Ware Brothers, of Beverly, Mass., are actively supervising the construction of their new photoplay house now building in Beverly. Just to keep their hands in the game, the Ware Brothers leased the Medford Opera House and the town hall at Marblehead, Mass., where Licensed pictures are shown tri-weekly. Both houses are doing well. The New Beverly house is to be an elegant house, and will be described at length upon its completion. The new house has not yet been named.

Ocean Hall, Harwich, Mass., is an excellent house, owned and managed by Walter R. Nickerson. The house holds 700 on the ground floor, and runs four reels of Independent service and two illustrated songs. Mr. Nickerson has installed his own electrical plant for juice, and is having fine results. The Ocean Hall projects an excellent picture, and does a good business.

There have been several changes at the Boston office of the General Film Company lately. Mr. Frank McKay has succeeded Frank Vine, while Frank Cavanaugh has taken up the duties of Mr. Ralph Pinkham.

The National Theater, Boston, which just opened, is playing to big business.

One of the largest electrical signs in Boston, is the one just made for Marcus Loew's South End Theater. This sign is 40 by 30 feet, and makes a great advertisement for the house.

There is considerable talk of the photoplay theater of Springfield, Mass., opening on Sundays. The question is being actively agitated with the chances decidedly in favor of the opening.

The Blake Theatrical Company, which operates a chain of photoplay theaters throughout the smaller cities of New England, has leased the Clement Theater, Dover, N. H. Mr. E. Clements, formerly ran the house. Business is usually good.

HENRY.

PITTSBURG.

Mr. James Velas, owner of the Bijou, Lyceum and Lyric photoplay palaces at Wheeling, W. Va., honored this city's moving picture circles with his presence recently, principally at the Independent Film Exchange. Mr. Velas is an old retainer of the Independent exchange and when in town one can usually locate him there.

Mr. Velas offered the information that the Victoria Theater, Geo. A. Shaeffer, manager and proprietor, has enlarged the seating capacity to accommodate the large crowds that come to the Victoria daily to admire the good pictures projected. Mr. Velas also stated that within two months two new picture palaces will be opened in Wheeling. In fact ground was broken on the 25th September, at the corner 16th and Market Streets adjoining and in the rear of the old Federal Building. The lot is 50 x 132 feet. When completed it will be one of the largest picture houses in Wheeling. Mr. Chas. Feunler will be manager. The second house is being built by Messrs. Gatby & Smith, at 6th and Main Streets. The Dreamland Theater, at 3943 Jacobs Street, has closed its doors. Lack of patronage is the reason advanced. Mr. Fred Kenuth was the manager.

The Olympic Theater repeated "Thelma," the old Thanhouser masterpiece, for the fourth time to a crowded and well satisfied audience. Repeating old photoplay masterpieces seems to have become a vogue with enterprising managers in this section. This fact is shown by the Minerva also, for the Minerva repeated the Imp film "The Rosary" twice in two weeks, and at every instance played to crowded houses. It seems that articles in the Moving Picture World have not been in vain after all, concerning repeating good old pictures.

The Olympic Theater was the first in town to exhibit the Thanhouser "Austin Flood" in moving pictures. Praise is also due to Mr. Allison, the wideawake manager and owner of the Pastime Theater, Market Street, as being the first to exhibit slides of this disaster the next day after it occurred.

The Star Family Theater, at Tarentown, Pa., is using licensed films as their feature attraction for the first three days of the week, and high class vaudeville for the last three days. Mr. J. B. Boyd is the manager, and handsome Jimmy Boyd is his very capable assistant.

"Clio and Phyletes" was featured at the Imp Theater, Uniontown, Pa. (Hall, Case & Miles, managers and owners) to capacity business. The Dixie Theater, of the same city, featured the "Fall of Troy" for three days to overflowing box office receipts, although this was a repeater. Mr. Frank L. Hall is the manager. Mr. Hall has very progressive ideas concerning the management of a theater, and he certainly denotes it by his neatly worded and printed program. Mr. Hall himself is one of the most genial and cheerful men one would wish to meet.

"The Two Orphans" as a whole performance was given at the new Majestic Theater, on 5th Avenue. Mr. R. Saltz, the manager, states that his patrons were delighted with this picture and he is waiting with impatience to show the rest of the three reel subjects.

The Rex Theater, at 6017 Penn Avenue, has shown a wonderful increase in attendance, as the moving picture season is setting in. Mr. Max W. Herring is still attending to things in the same systematic manner which has classed him as a successful manager.

There has been a tendency in this and neighboring towns to employ boy operators in order to cut down expenses. It seems that the law concerning this has been grossly neglected, for although the rules and regulations of the Bureau of Electricity state that no one under twenty-one years of age will be given a permit to operate a moving picture machine, yet there are numerous instances where permits were issued to young chaps not over eighteen, and some of them are too green to know how to properly thread a film. It may not be a crime for young boys of sixteen or seventeen years of age to emulate their older brethren and look for the poorest paid position in the trade, yet no one can deny that it is a crime that the lives of hundreds of people should be placed in the hands of boys not out of their teens.

The Sprague Amusement Company, of Bellaire, Ohio, have leased White's Opera House, and are using photoplays the last three nights in the week, with legitimate attractions for the first part. Independent films supplied by the Pittsburg Photoplay Company is being used. Mr. M. E. Johnson is the manager. The seating capacity is 2,200.

New additions to the film circle have been Sam Wheeler as assistant shipper at the Pittsburg Photoplay Company offices, and Franklin Donahue, at the Peerless Film Exchange, also in the same capacity.

On Wednesday, September the twentieth, 1911, the Majestic Theater, on Fifth Avenue, was opened to the public. And true to his promise, Mr. R. Soltz has given Smokytown's photoplay phans, a veritable MAJESTIC Theater. About five years ago Mr. Soltz purchased the Wonderland Theater next door to an Episcopalian church. A year later Mr. Stoltz leased this church and remodeled it into the Majestic Theater, operating both the Wonderland and the Majestic at the same time. At the expiration of the Wonderland lease, Mr. Soltz decided to concentrate his attention to the Majestic alone, with the result that this theater can now be truthfully termed the nicest and safest house uptown. Although as yet it has the original seating capacity of 300, it is contemplated to extend the seating to 500.

Mr. Harry Megowan, corresponding secretary of the Moving Picture Exhibitors' League of Pennsylvania, valorously championed the cause of the exhibitor in a letter answering an editorial in the Pittsburgh Dispatch, commenting on the morality of moving pictures. Although this comment was mainly about the expectant release pepicting the story of a wayward girl, yet it threw a doubt upon the morality of all moving pictures exhibited. The letter was as follows:

"Editor of the Pittsburgh Dispatch:

"Having read the editorial column of your issue of the 22nd inst., under the head of 'Repulsive Moving Pictures,' concerning a class of pictures that is being put out or talked of being produced by a Washington concern, I wish to say, in behalf of the Moving Picture Exhibitors' League of Pennsylvania, that we indorse your statement and action in exposing, as you say, any of the distorting, degrading and sensational scenes in all moving pictures. I have been a delegate to the national convention of exhibitors, held in Cleveland, Aug. 1st, and as a member of the National Censorship Board of the National Association, I assure you that it is the aim of all the members to bring the moving picture business to its highest standard and that we welcome any and all suggestions in regard to moving picture films being produced or shown upon any curtain of our theaters throughout the state. Hoping that you will place the moving picture exhibitors in right, we remain,

"Respectfully yours,
"M. P. Exhibitors' League of Pa.,
"HARRY MEGOWAN, Cor. Secretary."

Mr. W. A. Pittis, first vice-president of the Ohio Exhibitors' League, visited the offices of the Moving Picture Exhibitors' League this week. Mr. Pittis is one of the foremost moving picture exhibitors in the Buckeye State, being the owner of a large circuit of houses both in Ohio and Pennsylvania.

The members of the Moving Picture Exhibitors' League and the moving picture trade in general, extend their deepest sympathies to Mr. Thos. Barbin, the vice-president of the league. Mr. Barbin, while driving, fell off a wagon and was kicked in the head by the horse. Seventeen stitches were sewn in his head, but it is said that he will recover shortly. Mr. Barbin will be missed greatly during his absence.

DENISON ARC REFLECTOR

Pat. Applied for

THE MOST PRACTICAL AND USEFUL INVENTION SINCE THE MOVING PICTURE MACHINE

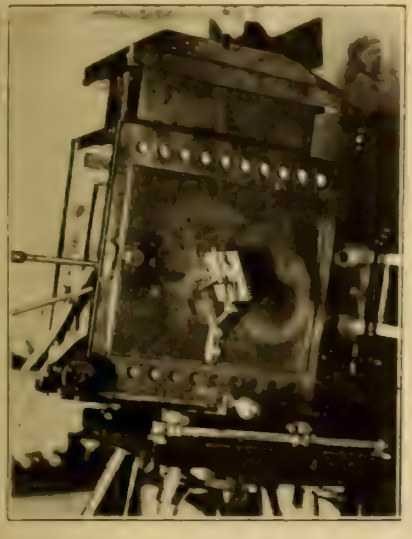
This reflector is not a piece of looking glass but a specially made reflector that reflects nothing but the most intense light.

Enables the most expert operator to keep a 50 per cent better light and a more uniform light

It brings out all the detail in a soft light that does not injure the eye. Carbons are reflected exactly as they are in the lamp house

Operator can see his carbons from any position at the head of the machine.

This picture shows reflector attached to lamp house.



Denison's Arc Reflector is adjustable to any angle. Can be attached to any lamp house in five minutes. Nothing to get out of order, nothing to break, compact and out of the way.

PLAIN FACTS

If an operator did not watch his picture he could not tell when it was good or bad, consequently he watches it.

If he could watch his carbons just as easy as his picture he could keep a better light on his picture.

With Denison's Arc Reflector the carbon points are always before you.

Operators now using Denison's reflector would not be without it.

It will teach an operator many things about the moving picture machine arc.

Full nickel-plated and guaranteed to last a life time.

Price $3.00 prepaid to any part of the United States or Canada.

FOR HER BROTHER'S SAKE (Oct. 30).—Bob Graham, a prospector, finds gold as the result of a landslide which carries him in its path and therefore, he calls his mine "The Lucky Fall." His first assay brings him a nice sum of money, which he keeps in a strong box at his cabin.

Mary, his wife, receives a letter from her brother, Allen, stating that he had been accused of smuggling guns across the border and flight being imperative, he asks for money to assist him. She is greatly shocked and succeeds in keeping her secret from Bob, who inquires regarding the letter. Mary begs her husband for the use of their savings, but being unable to offer a good reason she is refused.

While Bob is at the mine, the brother, Allen, comes into the cabin. Bob returning unexpectedly, sees the couple through the window and not knowing Allen, suspects Mary of being unfaithful. Mary slips out and conducts her brother to the mine, where work has been suspended for the day, the workmen fearing a cave-in. Bob follows the couple, and to his horror sees them enter the shaft, which is shortly after closed by a cave-in. Bob feels that it is "a judgment of Heaven on the guilty pair," and returns home to pack his belongings and leave. While thus engaged, he finds a photograph of Allen bearing an inscription which discloses his identity. Bob also finds the letter. Hastily gathering a number of workmen he hurries to the shaft, where by prodigious labor, they succeed in extricating the couple. Mary's action is fully explained and Bob gives Allen money to aid him in his flight. When the pursuing sheriff arrives, he finds his man safely across the border.

THE GREATEST OF ENGINEERING FEATS (Nov. 1).—When New York City's new water system is completed, the clear water of the Catskill Mountain streams will flow through the city mains, adding 700,000,000 gallons daily to the present supply. This new system, costing millions of dollars, requires the construction of reservoirs and dams and an aqueduct 92 miles long.

In watching this moving picture, one might think he was standing along the course of the Panama Canal, so gigantic is the undertaking of removing whole townships for the reservoirs and tunnelling through mountains, preparing a pathway for the aqueduct.

THE PLOT AGAINST BERTIE (Nov. 1).—Bertie arrives at the summer hotel and immediately monopolizes the attention of the ladies. The jealous men gather and form a plot to humble Bertie. A newspaper reporter places an item in the paper, stating that a man of Bertie's description is suspected of having cholera and has evaded the health authorities. Bertie's adventures when the paper anpears and the manner in which he gets the best of the plotters, is one continuous laugh.

THE PRICE OF AMBITION (Nov. 3).—Donna Elvira, the beautiful daughter of an old Spanish family, is ambitious to marry a man of wealth, who will shower his countless riches upon her. With this selfish aim, she rejects the offer of marriage from Cesare, an honest young man of noble character, and gives her hand to Don Manuel, a wealthy, but overbearing Spaniard of middle age. Cesare's heart is broken as he sees the bridal party departing from the church and he wanders into the country, that he may be alone with his sorrow.

In his wanderings he stops to rest outside of an old mission. It is the hour of vespers and the monks pass by on their way to service. One of them, Father Alphonzo, discovers the dejected young man and endeavors to comfort him. He points out to Cesare the peace that follows prayer and faith. As a result the young man joins the mission.

A few years later Donna Elvira, who married without love, awakes to the unhappiness of such a union. She accompanies a party, led by her husband, which passes through the grounds of the mission. Becoming fatigued she rests under the shadow of the old gate, while her people walk on. There she meets Cesare. Her old love is kindled and she endeavors to embrace the young monk. Elvira, having located Cesare, plans an intrigue to meet him without his knowledge. She prepares a note as if it were written by a poor countryman, asking that the father visit his sick wife. Elvira then hurries to the cottage and arranges with the woman, little knowing that one of her husband's spies has followed her. Cesare is dumbfounded when he arrives and discovers the plot. The spy hastens to warn his master who furiously rushes to the cottage. Drawing his sword, Don Manuel thrusts at the guiltless monk, but Donna Elvira steps between them and receives the blade.

SELIG.

Indian, back with him to the city for a visit. Raleigh's wife and family are so pleased with "Loe" that they send a basket of clothes to Loe's family. The family mourn the absence of their papoose, and decide to go to the city after him. Dressing in the clothing as best they can, they start for Raleigh's. Needless to say, consternation and embarrassment reigned supreme in the Raleigh household upon the arrival of the comically dressed Indians. Making the best of it, however, the Raleigh's received them, and bade them make themselves at home. Loe's father needed no second invitation, and finding a bottle of "Devil water," he proceeded to get beautifully intoxicated. In the meantime the rest of Loe's family were doing their best to enjoy themselves, at the expense of the Raleighs.

A night of riot followed, enjoyment for the Indians and utter misery for the Raleighs. In the morning the "Little Injin" and his socially ambitious family were sent back to their desert home by the sadder but wiser Raleighs.

CAPTAIN BRAND'S WIFE (Oct. 31).—Captain Brand's troop is ordered to Arizona just one week after his marriage to Ada Jackson. Among others who go, is Lieut. Moore, a former suitor for Ada's hand.

After being gone a year, Capt. Brand makes final arrangements to have his family with him in Arizona. So taking her little baby, Lillian, and her maid, she starts to join her husband.

She is met by him, and they start to the fort in a stage coach, the only mode of conveyance, with part of the troop as an escort.

They do not proceed far, however, for they are seen, chased, and overtaken by a small band of renegade Indians, and several troopers are killed before the stage continues.

Lieut. Moore, who is on scouting duty, hears the shots, and rushes to the rescue. He finds the bodies of the troopers, and under the direction of Ada's maid, whom he found lost in the woods, continues his chase.

In the meantime, the Indians have again overtaken the coach, killed Capt. Brand, and one is about to dash Ada's baby over the cliff, when Moore arrives, and shoots him, thus saving the baby's life, and winning for him the gratitude of Ada, and four years later (helped by little Lillian), her love.

THE INNER MIND (Nov. 2).—Prof. Locksley, the famous hypnotic detective, unravels a mystery through his knowledge of the "Indian mind." The story tells of how a thug of the lowest order holds in his power a beautiful girl until Prof. Locksley gets control, and by a clever process of reasoning lands the thug behind prison bars. No detective picture hitherto produced can compare with this masterpiece of stage construction. The situations and thrilling and intense, and the Selig players have shown their versatility by so cleverly handling in a highly artistic way this really exceptional picture play.

HIS FIRST LONG TROUSERS (Nov. 3).—Jimmy Graham has reached the age of sports and feels quite able to support the added dignity of long trousers. He saves up his pennies and makes his purchase. He is under the impression that the pair which he has been induced to buy, through the efforts of a Jewish salesman, is too long, but the salesman assures him this is a good fault, as he is a growing boy. Proudly he marches home and exhibits his advent from Knickerbockers. His father laughs long and loudly, and finally tells the boy that the trousers are too long. He asks his mother, and sister and even Nora, the cook, if they won't cut off a little the ends of each leg in order to reduce them to the proper length, but each is too busy to be bothered. Downcast, he climbs to his room, and deciding to do the job himself, he does so, with the aid of a jack knife. Then he gets into bed and is soon asleep. Later his mother, feeling sorry for the boy, goes to his room and removes a length from the trousers. Then sister and Nora each quietly and unknown to the other, go to Jimmy's room and repeat the cutting process. And last of all Father Graham does his share of supposed good work. In the morning Jimmy views the result with tear dimmed eyes and swears vengeance on "such a family."

SEEING INDIANAPOLIS (Nov. 3).—An interesting travel picture, one of the famous Selig series of "Sight Seeing Trips to Principal Cities of the World."

GAUMONT.

FRIDOLIN (Oct. 28).—The story of Fridolin, a faithful page to the Countess of Savern. He excites the jealousy of Robert, a cruel huntsman, who plots to end his career by carrying untruths to the Count. But when Fridolin's death is planned, by a strange coincidence, the dishonest Robert falls into the trap and the page is justified in the eyes of his master and the fair countess.

THE PRINCIPALITY OF MONACO (Oct. 28).—Scenes in and about the famous gaming place, Monte Carlo. The film is especially beautiful in the portions showing the luxuriant tropical foliage, consisting of palms, eucalyptus, lemon-trees and geraniums.

THE WIDOWER (Oct. 31).—A widower with two children, Jimmie and Toto, is smitten by an attractive neighbor. As his mother and father live with him, he tells them of his infatuation, and of his desire to marry again. Later he introduces his fiancee to them. The children are so grieved at the prospect that they make up their minds to run away and in the dead of night manage to escape. The family are immediately alarmed and at once go in pursuit. Meanwhile, the children have made their way to the river bank, and embarked in one of two boats which are moored there. In a charming series of pictures we see their voyage down stream and their ultimate landing some distance from home. The father and grandparents take the other boat and continue the pursuit. Some way down the stream they find a cap which Jimmie has lost and this brings the worst fears to their minds. When they land to search for the fugitives, the heart-broken grandmother, completely overcome with grief, waits at the boat. Jimmie and Toto, who are hidden nearby, emerge from the rushes and comfort her. The miller, realizing that owing to the children's attitude, his marriage will be impossible, ends the betrothal and resigns himself to the inevitable.

THE JESTING PRINCESS (Nov. 4).—Clarence is in love with Joan, and he has no thoughts for anyone else. Jealous girls who are piqued at his indifference, bring the matter to the attention of his parents, who send him away to study in town. On his journey thither Clarence is obliged to inquire the way from a number of maids of honor who are resting beside the highway. Charmed by his appearance, they decide to present him to their Princess, and do so despite his resistance and entreaties. The Princess learns of his infatuation for Joan and decides to put his love to the test. "If you will not love me," she says, "I shall have you put to death," but Clarence remains steadfast. Greatly impressed by his fidelity and devotion, the Princess sends for Joan, and in a delightful picture we see the two lovers united before the sacred Temple of Love.

BELGIAN CAVALRY AT EXERCISE (Nov. 4).—Daring horsemen in a wonderful display of dangerous riding. Also showing scores of perfectly trained horses in an exhibition of their intelligence.

ECLIPSE.

TRAPPED (Nov. 1).—An absorbing story of two chums and their rivalry for the hand of Mabel, a beautiful girl. Robert plots to disgrace George by forging a signature and placing the guilt upon his friend. However, Robert accidentally leaves his thumb print on the paper. The mark is discovered by the lawyer who defends George, and Mabel cleverly obtains another print of Robert's thumb. Through this he is proven guilty and the innocent man is liberated.

ESSANAY.

OUTWITTING PAPA (Oct. 11).—Ethel Walker and Tom Phelps are engaged to marry, but father objects. Later, when the old gentleman finds his daughter writing a note to Tom, promising him to elope, he calls in blacksmiths and has them put bars on the windows and grating in the door. The next day Tom learns of the girl's imprisonment, and, calling at his dentist's, where he finds Ethel's father has an appointment for the next day, he writes a note to Ethel and tells her to have her father take her with him. Tom disguises as the dentist, and when the couple arrive, he puts the old man in a chair and administers gas. When the old fellow is unconscious, he writes a note and places it in the old fellow's hand, after which the two young people hurry to the minister's. The wedding is in progress when the old man enters and prohibits the bans. However, he is forced to confess that Tom and Ethel have outwitted him and he hands the girl over to the happy young man.

THE RIGHT JOHN SMITH (Nov. 2).—John Smith, calling on his sweetheart one night, leaves his pocketbook on the library table. The next morning the girl tells the maid to call up Mr. Smith and tell him that she has the pocketbook, and for him to call for it. The maid looks up the number in the telephone directory, and finding a whole lot of John Smiths, calls several of them before her mistress finds out what she is doing. When the calls are received by wives of the wrong John Smiths, there is a general stampede to the house of the hussy, but things are soon explained when the right John Smith appears.

HI FEATHERTOP AT THE FAIR (Nov. 2).—A real, old-fashioned "reub" comedy, which is full of laughs from start to finish. The scenes were taken at a real country fair, and shows the adventures of Hi with the bunco men and how he won the pie-eating contest.

BILL BUMPER'S BARGAIN (Nov. 3).—Bill Bumper, a tramp, finds a book containing the libretto of Faust. After vainly trying to find a comfortable and quiet place to read, he settles down on the warm side of a haystack. He falls asleep and dreams the devil appears and makes him a bargain to the effect that Bill will exchange his soul for 12 hours of worldly pleasure. Bill's every wish is granted. He meets Marguerite and the two visit a swell café, a theater and have a joy ride. At the end of the twelve hours Bill is again visited by the devil, who takes him to the infernal regions, where he pays dearly for his twelve hours of gayety.

THE OUTLAW DEPUTY (Nov. 4).—Buck Stevens, an outlaw, escapes from the county jail, but is speedily captured and locked up again. In more ways than one Buck is shown kindness by the sheriff, who urges him to serve his time. A few years later, when Buck is released, he reads that there is a reward for the capture of one Dare Devil Kelly, hiding in Snake Canon. The sheriff is incapacitated through injury to his ankle and after vainly calling for volunteers to go after the bad man, the sheriff gives Buck the chance. Buck, after a hot fight with the outlaw and his wife, captures Kelly, though he has suffered some at the hands of Mrs. Kelly, a real Amazon. Later, Buck, who is in sympathy with Kelly's wife, mails her the reward money he has received, with the hope that it will tide her over until her husband is released.

LUBIN.

SOMEBODY'S MOTHER (Oct. 30).—John Sawyer bade his aged mother good-bye and went to the Klondike. Three years pass, and Mrs. Sawyer is reduced to abject poverty through the dishonesty of a lawyer, so she made her abode in an attic.

One day, while she was picking up chips of wood and pieces of coal in the street, she was tormented by a crowd of boys. Jimmy, a little newsboy, suddenly rushed into the midst of them and rescued her. He took her basket and then assisted her home. It was only a few weeks later when Mrs. Sawyer, unable to pay her rent, was even ejected from this attic.

Just about this time, John Sawyer returned, having made a fortune. Failing to find his mother in their little cottage, he was walking away, when Jimmy happened along and recognized him as the original of a photograph that Mrs. Sawyer had shown him. Jimmy rushed up and told John where his mother was, and together they hurried to the poor little room, only to find that she had left. John was nearly in despair, but Jimmy cheered him up and they walked back again to the little cottage. Mrs. Sawyer had also wandered thither, and there they found her, just about ready to give up the battle of life.

There was a happy reunion. The little cottage was re-purchased by John, and after that you may be sure Jimmy was one of the household.

A GAY TIME IN NEW YORK CITY (Nov. 1).—Arthur Douglas wanted to go to New York with a friend to see the sights along the Great White Way. He knew his employer would hardly approve of letting him off from business for this purpose, so he had a telegram sent to himself, stating that his mother was very ill. With tears in his eyes he showed this message to his employer with the desired result.

Arthur and his friend met a couple of lovely little "fairies" in New York and then the gay time started.

Meanwhile Arthur's employer had received a telegram which made it necessary for him to visit the New York office. After finishing his business he took a walk in Central Park, where he found a lady's hand bag. He was amazed to find in it a photograph of Arthur; also a card with the name and address of Arthur's mother. As it was in the neighborhood, he decided to call. He met Mrs. Douglas, who was far from sick; indeed, she was a beautiful and buxom widow of forty. She had not seen Arthur.

What might have happened to Arthur if Mrs. Douglas had not been beautiful, buxom, a widow and forty, it is hard to say; but as she was all these things, Arthur's employer promptly fell in love with her and in due time became Arthur's stepfather.

ONE ON RENO (Nov. 2).—Mrs. Appleby, whose husband is more interested in his books than her happiness, took the first train to Reno to obtain a divorce. She left a note on the table to this effect, which certainly brought Mr. Appleby's brains to a realization of what he had done. He too took a train to Reno, followed by Mr. Brooks, who was bestowing his attentions upon Mrs. Appleby, during her husband's negligence.

Mrs. Appleby, after residing in Reno the required number of days by law, secured a divorce. Her ex-husband and Mr. Brooks, who called upon her were unceremoniously turned out of her apartments. Then she started for home.

Mr. Appleby's sorrow was turned into joy one evening when he read in the papers of a decision handed down by the courts to the effect that a divorce procured in Reno by a certain person was null and void. So he went over to his mother-in-law's house and found her more beautiful than ever. Then he lifted her up in his arms and took her to their old home, after planting his fists upon Mr. Brooks' nose, who dropped to the floor and took the count.

THE MEXICAN (Nov. 4).—Rose and Tom Harvey were engaged and Rose lived with Mrs. Harvey while Tom was away with his troop in the army. Things had not gone well with the two women and their Mexican landlord, Senor Lopez was not patient for his rent. One day he called and insolently informed them that unless the rent was paid by noon of the next day, they would be put out.

That day Rose received a letter from Tom stating that he would arrive home; that he was now a sergeant and had saved enough money so that they could be married. Tom arrived in due time. He gave his money into the keeping of Rose. The crafty Lopez happened to be looking in at the window and he saw the big roll of money. He entered and demanded his rent in such an insulting way that Tom slapped his yellow cheeks and ordered him out.

The Mexican, set upon revenge, went to the rendezvous of some bandits, whom he told of the money in Rose's possession. They started for the cottage and then a spirited fight ensued between them and the inmates of the house. Tom fought bravely until the ammunition was nearly gone. Then Rose bravely climbed up the wide, old-fashioned chimney, ran over the roofs, descended and secured one of the bandits' horses, on which she galloned to the camp of Tom's troop. The captain quickly ordered the troop to saddle. They arrived at the cottage just as Tom was being overpowered.

BIOGRAPH.

LOVE IN THE HILLS (Oct. 30).—The old soldier's little daughter has two persistent suitors. One, a manly fellow, who tells the girl she will marry him in spite of all. Her other suitor is a good-natured, shiftless chap, whose weaknesses are booze and music, he being the village fiddler. He tries to get the lead on his neighbor by presenting her with a mammoth pumpkin. He thinks this little attention should win her, but she has met and become interested in a young stranger from the big city, who is hunting and fishing in these hills. The fiddler, despairing, plays soulfully on his violin, thinking the strains may soften her heart—they do, but for the other fellow, with whom she consents to elope. Her manly friend prevents this, however, by driving the city fellow away. The girl realizes the error of her intentions and accepts her mountain knight, just as the fiddler arrives to renew his suit, aided by the pumpkin. He might have exclaimed, "Well, I'll be darned," but he simply ejaculates "Oh! pumpkins!"

A VICTIM OF CIRCUMSTANCES (Nov. 2).—It is hubby's birthday and the wife wishing to surprise him, surreptitiously interviews the jeweler's clerk to order a gold watch as a present. Her mysterious action arouses suspicion in the husband, who follows her at a distance and witnesses the meeting between her and the clerk. The hour arriving for the delivery of the watch, wifey goes to the door to meet it, and while standing outside, the door closes and locks on her skirt, holding her captive. Having no key, she induces the clerk to climb through the second story window and come down to unlock the door. All would have been well, but the clerk encounters the husband and it looked bad for the clerk for a while.

THEIR FIRST DIVORCE CASE (Nov. 2).—Mrs. Grimm catches her lord, Mr. Grimm, strolling in the park with a chorus girl. She at once decides to get a divorce and sends his photograph with a letter to the "Two Sleuths." Meanwhile, the penitent Mr. Grimm has pacified his irate spouse, and to make amends takes her on a little trip. The sleuths, however, get the letter and follow them, thinking the wife is the woman mentioned.

EDISON.

THE REFORM CANDIDATE (Oct. 31).—John Bryce is engaged to Gertrude, daughter of Curtis Greer, president of the Interurban Railway.

Bryce and Greer become involved in a political discussion, much to Gertrude's annoyance, but when she finds that Bryce opposes her father's argument she becomes greatly incensed and treats him coldly.

The citizens becoming disgusted with the corrupt administration of the machine, draw up a reform ticket and offer the nomination for mayor to Bryce. He accepts and the editor of the News sends Edith Sincla ir tointerview him. McNamara, the machine candidate, rushes to Greer with the news of Bryce's nomination. Greer visits Bryce and gives him the choice of either withdrawing or having the engagement broken. Bryce declines to withdraw, whereupon Gertrude hands him her engagement ring. This interview, however, has been overheard by Edith, who has entered the room unseen and taken down the conversation in shorthand. Seeing Bryce's dejected attitude, she sacrifices a big scoop by tearing up her notes.

Greer, fearing that the Interurban will not obtain its new franchise if Bryce is elected, meets McNamara at a café and gives him a written promise of a certain number of shares of stock if he will grant the franchise when elected. Edith, who has folowed Greer into the café, overhears this, and by a clever ruse obtains this evidence of bribery.

Rushing to Bryce's office she shows him this proof, but when he asks her why she brought it to him instead of her editor, she can only stammer and blushingly hangs her head. They both rush to the newspaper office and lay the paper before the editor, who gets out an extra which wins the day for Bryce. Incidentally, Bryce also wins Edith as his bride.

THE RISE AND FALL OF WEARY WILLIE (Nov. 1).—So many beggars have been visiting Rev. Dr. Helpall, that he decides to be a tramp himself, thereby ascertaining the cause of their idleness. He boards a freight car, where he comes face to face with "Weary Willie," from whom he gets much valuable information. Dr. Helpall soon succumps to his strenuous riding, and falls fast asleep. Maenwhile the train has reached the town at which the committee is awaiting the doctor. They mistake "Weary Willie" for him, and he is given a good dinner, while the doctor is being escorted to the lock-up. However, matters are soon cleared up, and the tramp gets his just deserts.

THE GIRL AND THE MOTOR BOAT (Nov. 3).—We become acquainted with a young inventor, who hopes that his new motor will bring him enough money to make him eligible in the eyes of the gracious but careful mother of the girl with millions. We see that the girl loves him, and cares nothing for the other man whom her mother favors.

What Causes People to continually patronize one Picture Theatre in preference to another? Of course, location, appearances, films, etc. have a great deal to do with it, but quality of the picture is what builds up a steady patronage that makes the business profitable.

This depends largely on your light and if you are using any other device than a

In order to get the first motor built the young inventor is obliged to make payments which nearly wipe out his small bank account. He even gives a promissory note, which must be paid before he can get his boat ready for the races, which are to prove its value and gain him the big contract which spells independence.

At the last moment he draws a check, thinking that he is sure to win the race and so get money with which to cover it at the bank. Knowledge of this reaches his rival. The latter has entered his own swift boat in the race, so it becomes a contest for love and honor too. Fearing the new motor, we see the rich man plan to put the young inventor and his boat out of the running. But he forgets that the girl has learned the ways of a motor boat and so, just as he believes that the race is his, we see her suddenly appear among the contestants. Of course she drives the new engine and the boat to victory. But it is a gloriously exciting race, and the end of the story is both pleasant and unusual.

LOVE AND HATRED (Nov. 4).—Tom and Jack are rivals for the hand of Nell, a pretty school teacher. Jack is the favored one, and soon they are married, which makes Tom a life-long enemy of Jack. A year after their marriage, Jack, in an intoxicated state, strikes and deserts his wife. Tom hears of this, and manages to send her money, unknown to her.

Months after Tom and Jack are brought face to face on a barren trail. Tom is about to shoot Jack, but seeing his condition decides to let him live. As Tom is helping Jack across a ravine his strength fails him and he falls to his death. Tom apprises Nell of this, and asks her to marry him. She accepts.

VITAGRAPH.

CAPTAIN BARNACLE, DIPLOMAT (Oct. 30).—Capatin Josiah Bartlett is the oracle of the village. He receives a note from his old pal, Sam Ruggles, telling him that his daughter Jenny refuses to marry a very worthy young fisherman, Dick Marlin, because he is too good.

Sam and Dick arrive at the captain's home, who tells them that the way for Dick to make Jenny love him is for Dick to start on an apparent course of dissipation, and he advises Sam to forbid the match.

The trots Dick off to the village "pub" and starts him drinking. He makes him try to sing songs on the village green and make a fool of himself generally. Sam contrives that Jenny shall see all this. He then pretends to fly into a rage and abuse Dick. Jenny gets sympathetic. Finally Dick whips the village bully, the butcher. Jenny goes to assure Dick of her friendship, when the latter, who gains confidence, seizes her in his arms and kisses her, proposes again and is accepted.

MADGE OF THE MOUNTAINS (Oct 31).—Harry Brownley, son of a rich New Yorker, reads a newspaper account of U. S. Revenue officers' plan to raid an illicit distillery in the Tennessee mountains. The young fellow asks his father's permission to join the forces under Sheriff Jackson, of Pikesville, Tennessee. The father reluctantly consents and the son starts out to satisfy his adventurous nature. The forces raid the cabin of Bill Blair a moonshiner, who resents the attack, and during the raid, Blair and his companions are killed. Of the raiding forces, Harry Brownley is severely wounded.

Madge, Blair's daughter, offers to care for and nurse young Brownley until his father is notified and arrives to take him back with him to New York. During his confinement in the cabin, young Brownley falls in love with Madge and when his father comes to take him home, Harry tells her that he will return for her and make her his wife. Mr. Brownley does not take kindly to the idea. He advises Harry to forget it, but to this he will not agree, and with much sorrow, the two young lovers part.

At his home in New York, Harry grows worse and unable to return to his sweetheart or even to write to her. When he gets stronger, he writes her a letter, with the assistance of the nurse; his father intercepts the letter and destroys it.

In the meantime, Madge cannot stand the suspense. She determines to come to New York to see Harry and learn the cause of his silence. She arrives at the Brownley mansion and is refused admission by the butler, who pushes her from the door. She calls Harry's name. By intuition he recognizes her voice. Summoning all his strength, he rushes down to the stoop, where he finds Madge in charge of a policeman, whom the butler has called. Harry tell the officer his services are not required, clasps her to his breast and leads her into the house. His father is at first angry and refuses to recognize Madge, but when he sees the sincerity of her love for his boy and that Harry's happiness depends upon his consent and approval of their marriage, he no longer refuses to grant it, and receives Madge into his heart and home as his daughter.

A SOUTHERN SOLDIER'S SACRIFICE (Nov. 1).—Harry and Dick Linden, two brothers, are very much in love with Virginia Farnum. She gives Dick a red rose, significant of love, and to Harry she gives a "rosemary," which signifies remembrance. This serves to encourage them both and to display her coquetry. Harry proposes and is refused. Dick proposes and is accepted.

Shortly after this the Civil War breaks out. Harry joins the Confederate ranks and Dick takes up arms for the North.

Dick is disguised as a Negro and is commissioned to spy upon the Confederate army and enters the encampment of the very regiment of which Harry is a member, and who happens to be on picket duty. Dick is captured and placed in the guardhouse. Harry recognizes him, but Dick doesn't recognize his brother. Harry induces Dick to change clothes, thereby effecting his escape. Later on Harry is condemned to death for treason.

While at the home of Virginia, Dick reads in the newspapers of the death of his brother. His grief is unrestrained, and up to this time, he did not know it was his brother who effected his liberty. Virginia mourns with Dick and it is needless to say that they are soon married.

THE GOSSIP (Nov. 3).—It is a lovely, bright, sunny day, and Mrs. Rogers decides to go shopping. On her way to the stores, she meets the Rev. Mr. Stout, with whom she converses a few minutes. He, going in the same direction, very politely asks her if he can accompany her. She consents and they are walking and talking together when Pricilla Primp, whose facial characteristics are an evidence of her disposition to be considered general news budget of the town, gets a glimpse of them. She loses no time in telling all their friends and neighbors about what she has seen, not forgetting to add and to enlarge upon the incident. Mr. Stout, who is carrying Mrs. Rodgers' parasol, forgets to return it and contentedly goes his way after bidding her a cheery good-morning.

Mr. Stout has not proceeded very far when he meets another brother of the cloth and they agree to continue their walk to the river, where they hold sweet converse with each other. Interested in watching some boys swimming, they both sit down on the grassy bank with the parasol over their heads.

Priscilla Primp has gotten together a number of followers who are only too anxious to gratify their suspicions. When Priscilla and her companions reach the river bank, they are confronted by the parasol, whic entirely hides the two reverend gentlemen, and immediately come to the conclusion that it shades the objects of their search. Priscilla, on tip-toes, anxiously approaches the parasol, lifts it triumphantly and shouts: "Behold the guilty pair." The Rev. Mr. Stout and his friend, Mr. Churchly, are stretched out, peacefully dreaming in the land of nod. The followers of Pricilla Primp let forth an exclamation of surprise and disappointment, which arouses the two sleeping clergymen, who are quite as much astonished when they see a number of women chasing Priscilla out on the diving board placed on the bank, and can hardly believe their eyes when they see the fleeing woman jump into the river to escape her pursuers. The Rev. Mr. Stout plunges in after her, bringing her safely to shore. Disgusted with themselves, and the much dampened Priscilla, the women beat a hasty retreat, while the two godly men laugh heartily at the drenched Priscilla, who wends her way disconsolately alone across lots, to escape the jeers and jibes of her neighbors, which she feels await her, and knows she richly deserves.

A MESSAGE FROM BEYOND (Oct. 4).—Brought up in the lap of luxury and indulged in extravagance, Jack Morrison is gradually led into a life of ease and idleness, from which his father tries to arouse and induce him to interest himself in the large steel business, of which he is the head. Jack refuses to go to work; his father disowns him and tells him to leave the house. Jack's mother is heart-broken, and before her son leaves, gives him a rose, which is her favorite flower, and tells him whenever he is led into temptation to remember her parting words and the rose, indicative of her love.

Thrown upon his own resources, he throws himself into a course of dissipation which soon brings him to disgrace and degredation. It is not long before he is entirely lost sight of, and his mother mourns him for dead, until heart-broken, she grieves herself to death. The wayward boy, unconscious of his mother having passed away, with a faint spark of conscience left, sees a vision of her and is prompted from time to time to write to her, but gives up in despair. Accidentally he reads a notice in a newspaper of his mother's death. He decides to go to his father. He is refused assistance by his father, who seems to be more embittered against him than ever.

Jack longs for a look at the old home and the happy associations of his childhood. At night he enters his father's house, where he is confronted by a large portrait of his mother, and a vase of her favorite flowers standing on the mantle near it. He is overcome with remorse and sorrow. At this moment, his father, who has retired, hears him, comes down to the room, pistol in hand, and commands his son, whom he does not recognize, to throw up his hands. Jack makes himself known and pleads with his father, pointing to his mother's picture. His contrition strikes a tender chord in the heart of his father, and his love for his wife, the mother of his boy, reminding him that while he is not responsible for his son's deeds, he is responsible for his existence. With an outburst of uncontrolable grief, he clasps his son to his bosom and forgives him, while the boy promises to make amends for the past.

LOVE MOULDS LABOR (Nov. 1).—In the works of the Fuller Foundry, Margaret Fuller is saved from a terrible burn by the foreman, who himself is badly scalded. This leads to a close friendship between the two, which is looked on with decided disfavor by Kirk Stanley, a friend of Mr. Fuller and a suitor for Margaret's hand. Later labor troubles develop in the foundry and a strike is imminent. In the meantime Stanley has been taken into the firm and it is really his high-handed methods in dealing with the men that has caused dissatisfaction. Later Stanley attempts to take from Margaret a bracelet given to her by the men in the works, as a token of their esteem. The foreman sees this in time to prevent it, but it leads to a complete revolution in the foundry. Mr. Fuller coming upon the scene just in time to witness the end of the altercation, and dissolving partnership immediately with Stanley, leaving Margaret clasped in the foreman's arms.

A SIOUX LOVER'S STRATEGY (Nov. 2).—A Sioux Indian is in love with a girl of another tribe and tries to win her with many gifts, but another Indian outbids him. Greatly disappointed, the unhappy lover takes himself off and the girl goes with her husband to his home. Here the girl goes into a deep sleep after drinking a potion given her by a little boy who is in league with the unfortunate lover. Thinking that she is dead, the members of the tribe give her a customary Indian burial. From her couch of death, the body is stolen by her true lover, who, after being pursued by his rival's tribe across the plains, finally succeeds in delivering her into the tent of a medicine man, who brings her to life again, and they are left happily clasped in each others embrace.

THE COWARD (Nov. 4).—A younger and petted son is summoned by his brother to join the army, at the time of the great need in the Civil War. His old father, a veteran of the Mexican War, presents him with a sword and wishes him godspeed. In the first engagement the boy proves to be a coward and runs. Finally he reaches home, and there surrounded by a doting father, loving mother and admiring sister, he tells how he led the charge. In the meantime he is found missing at roll call after the battle and his brother, seeking him among the dead and wounded, learns from a dying soldier of his brother's cowardice. The horror-stricken officer seeks his cowardly brother and finds him at home, and in a most dramatic scene, tells the father of his son's loss of honor. However, under the threat of the father that he will kill himself unless his son retrieves his tarnished name, he seeks again the field of battle and in a magnificent charge, loses his life, but lives long enough to receive the handshake of his fellow officers.

C. G. P. C. (Pathe European).

GRANDFATHER'S VIOLIN (Oct. 39).—An old violinist is possessed of an instrument which is the dearest thing to his heart, except his little grandson. His daughter and her husband find the care of the old man a burden and believe that he has some money concealed somewhere in the house. They make a careful search, sometimes using the poor old man roughly, but have failed to find the hiding place. In such an atmosphere a man with a nature like his could not survive. After his death, the violin, the only memento left of the old man, is carefully cherished by his daughter and the old man's grandson. Subsequently the husband dies and the mother and the child are left in want. The boy, who has been taught to play upon the violin by his grandfather, goes out into the world to seek his fortune with the instrument, but almost immediately the violin is torn from his grasp and run over by a passing motor car. In picking up the fragments, the boy discovers the hiding place of the old man's wealth.

AN EPISODE UNDER HENRI III (Nov. 3).—Henri III, King of France, desired the removal of the Duke de Guise, who has been paying marked attention to Henri's sister, Marguerite of France, and so he hires a band of cut-throats to assassinate the Duke in a lonely spot on the road between Paris and Alencon. The King's sister, however, hears of this plot and sends her friend, the Duke de Bussy, to save her lover. Bussy succeeds in his mission, but later the King finds out who has befriended his sister in this matter and results alternately the death of the noble Duke.

MELIES.

RIGHT OR WRONG (Nov. 2).—Dick Dresler is one of the most faithful guardsmen of the Union line; one who hates a Confederate soldier like sin, and who swears to show no mercy on any rebel who crosses the line.

Tom Newhouse, a Confederate, gets news of his mother's approaching death and hastens to her side, having to steal his way through the Union line. Dick is on guard and discovers the footsteps, which he trails to Tom's home. He rushes into the house with raised gun and orders everyone to surrender, but is taken suddenly aback at the scene before him—a son's sorrowful farewell to his dying mother.

He slowly lowers his gun, realizing the meaning and the sacredness of Tom's visit. Dick himself has a mother, and in a moment of fond memory, disregards the rules of war and allows Tom's freedom. For many a day his conscience asked him the question that he concluded only the Great Judge could answer—did he do Right, or Wrong?

MEXICAN AS IT IS SPOKEN (Nov. 2).—Percy Gobbard, newly from London, visits a relative's ranch in Texas, near the Mexican border. The girls take every possible care of Percy, for Lord bless you, he is indeed a favorite, but on one occasion he escapes from the house alone, and, armed with his camera, purposes to have a real devilish time. He had not gone far when two bearded Mexicans, horrid men, approach him and gesticulate violently. They talk to him, but Mexican is Greek to Percy, and when he will not understand, they tie him with a rope.

Percy sends word home that he is being murdered. The girls get the cowboys and hasten to save their dear Percy. Meanwhile an explosion has occurred which more than makes Percy's life miserable.

Scene from "Mexican as it is Spoken" (Melies).

At last he is found, and in searching for the Mexicans all discover the cause of Percy's excitement. The dark-skinned, bewhiskered gentlemen were blasting, which Percy could not, would not see.

HIS DRESS SHIRT (Oct. 30).—Mr. Kirby has rather a tarty disposition for a newly married man and his wife is exactly the reverse, being eager to look after his comfort even to the minutest detail.

Kirby receives an invitation to attend a stag dinner on Thursday night and begins to make preparations Tuesday. He has only one dress shirt and admonishes his wife to have it sent to the laundry immediately. The wife sets about to do so, but she receives an invitation from a dear friend to go motoring and, of course, forgets all about the shirt.

The evening of the dinner arrives and Kirby returns home out of sorts. He hunts for the dress shirt and then consults his wife. It dawns on her that she has been remiss in her duty. Kirby fumes and rants to the consternation of the young wife. In her desperation, she decides to launder the shirt and takes it into the kitchen, where she makes elaborate preparations. As she is a novice in the laundry art, she makes a mess of it, ending in burning a hole through the shirt and ruining the garment.

Kirby enters the kitchen at the crucial time to find his wife in tears and the shirt smoking under the red hot iron. The humor of the situation mollifies him and he takes his wife in his arms and kisses away her tears.

A FEW MINUTES WITH STEEPLE-JACK LINDHOLM (Oct. 30).—One of the pictures show the dare-devil climber swaying in the air thirty-six stories from the pavement where a false move means death. Several scenes are shown of him on other staffs at a high altitude, making one of the most exciting pictures ever released. (Copyrighted 1911 by Independent Moving Pictures Co. of America.)

KING, THE DETECTIVE (Nov. 2).—Mr. Armstrong, a banker, returns to his home in his motor car driven by Ashton, his chauffeur, taking with him a large sum of money. His daughter, Edna, has a sweetheart, Walter Hoskins, who has been forbidden the house and ordered to cease his attentions to her. Hoskins gains entrance to the house by climbing the lattice work on the piazza and the act is seen by Ashton. Armstrong, asleep in his den, is murdered, the perpetrator being indistinct in the semi-darkness.

King, an expert detective, is called into the case. Suspicion points to Hoskins, as it is known that he has had a wordy war of words with the banker. The chauffeur tells his story of seeing the young man enter the house in a clandestine manner and he is arrested and charged with the crime. Edna believes implicitly in his innocence and implores King to clear him. The sleuth makes a minute search of the surroundings, examining the person of the dead man carefully. He finds thumb prints on the collar worn by Mr. Armstrong and makes his deductions from that fact. The young man is visited in prison by his sweetheart and told to be of good cheer.

King makes a thorough examination of the premises and visits the garage, examining the tools, etc. He is seen working in his laboratory, studying the thumb print under a powerful glass and then determines to try an experiment. Placing powder on his wrist he has an interview with Ashton, shaking hands with the driver, pressing his thumb firmly on the powder. Returning home, the print is examined and he is satisfied.

He visits the room in which the banker was killed and summons Ashton. Dramatically the detective goes through the actions of the murderer and, grasping the hand of the chauffeur, points to the thumb and accuses him of the crime, producing the wrench which was used to inflict the fatal blow.

The chauffeur is terrified and, with shaking knees, confesses the murder. Hoskins is released from prison and is warmly greeted by his sweetheart. Together they seek our King and thank him for his interest in the case. (Copyrighted, 1911, by Independent Moving Pictures Co. of America.)

THANHOUSER.

THE LOVES OF DAVID COPPERFIELD (Oct. 30).—Uriah Heep, the humble creature, loquacious Mr. Micawber, eccentric Aunt Betsy, Mr. Wickfield, the lawyer; Dora, the "Doll-wife;" lovelorn and sighing Agnes, and the others, all move about in a sphere totally Dickensonian.

The scenes are set in Mr. Wickfield's home, and his office, the homes of Aunt Betsy and David, and the church in which David is married to Dora.

The different incidents chosen for reproduction help to bring out forcibly the characteristics of the chief actors. The picture introduces the irrepressible Mr. Micawber, who is always waiting for something to "turn up." It covers the period of the story where David and his Aunt Betsy comes to the office of Wickfield and Hepp on a business transaction. Heep, the humble creature, is portrayed with almost startling realism.

Threaded with the machinations and forgeries of Uriah Heep and his final undoing through the sagacity and suspicions of Mr. Micawber, are David Copperfield's love affairs.

David is much attached to Agnes and Dora, but Dora's doll like face and childish manners captivate him and he marries her. The marriage, however, does not turn out a happy one, for Dora is a poor housekeeper with little mentality and less adaptability. Dora dies shortly after her marriage, and on her death-bed she asks Agnes to marry David. Agnes is in love with David from the very first, and when he returns from a trip abroad, after the death of his wife, he learns of Agnes' love for him and he marries for the second time.

THEIR BURGLAR (Nov. 3).—In the course of a fashionable reception at her home, a young girl quarrels with her suitor. Piqued by a fancied wrong, the girl with complaisance accepts the proposal of a foreign nobleman and determines to forget The Man forever.

As time progresses and the day set for her wedding to the sallow baron approaches, she is obsessed by a feeling of discontent and a yearning for her former lover. On the night before the wedding, in a moment of desperation she decides to recall her idol.

She pens a note in her boudoir, asking her lover to rescue her from a loveless marriage. At midnight she quietly goes downstairs. The lights are out in the drawing room, but by the candle light she fancies she sees the butler looking things up; in reality it is an interrupted half-scared burglar who had come to "look over" the wedding presents. She excitedly thrusts upon the bewildered burglar the note with instructions to deliver it at once, which he does after experiencing some trouble with a policeman, who happens to be awake at the time.

By delivering the letter to a happy recipient the burglar dodges the officers of the law. But the young man is slightly suspicious, and forces the burglar to accompany him back to the house, until he can learn why the girl selected such an extraordinary-looking messenger.

At the house the girl is bewildered. The burglar then confesses, and explains that he had called to steal the wedding presents, and asks them in return for the service he has rendered, to give him his liberty.

They grant his request and do more than that. The girl points out that the wedding gifts are valueless to her under the new arrangement. She is deeply grateful to the burglar, and is anxious to make him happy. So she gives him all the wedding gifts for his very own, and he departs, happy and contented.

Later when the couple are married they hear from him. He writes them that he has reformed, and is no longer a burglar, but a plumber; and he sends them a wedding gift, explaining that it is in return "for the bunch youse gave me." Being a plumber is a lead-pipe cinch for him to be honest.

YANKEE.

THE VAN OSTEN JEWELS (Oct. 30).—The Metropolitan police are mystified by a number of robberies, in which the robber leaves absolutely no clew. When a cable from France informs them to be on the lookout for a famous French crook who is a master of hypnotism. They assign their best detectives on his trail.

At the Van Osten reception the police mingle with the guests, and one of their number becomes suspicious of an apparently dignified French nobleman with exceptionally piercing eyes. His watchfulness is finally rewarded when he sees the Frenchman put under hypnotic power the young woman who is engaged to marry the son and heir of the Van Osten millions. The detective hears the explicit instructions given to the young woman to take the famous Van Osten jewels from their hiding place and bring them to him. Under the hypnotic power, the young woman obeys the command and is seen handing them to the Frenchman by her fiance. Thinking that his sweetheart is in league with the man, he obtains the jewels and permits suspicion to fall upon himself. All ends happily when the detective steps forth and arrests his man, compelling him first of all to release the woman from the hypnotic spell.

AT DAISY FARM (Nov. 3).—Mrs. Burridge, a widow, satisfied that her husband has died while in the U. S. army service, marries an honest old farmer, Andrew Armstrong, who gives her and her son a pleasant home. To supply his stepson with money the old man is compelled to mortgage his home. While he has the money in his possession he is accosted by an old tramp, who claims to be his wife's first husband and to keep the tramp from revealing the secret, he hands him the money he has received from the mortgage. This transaction is witnessed by his stepson, who robs the old tramp and throws him over a cliff.

Captain Craven, an ex-army officer, who is spending his vacation in the town, saves Kate, the stepson's fiance, from drowning and falls in love with her. In visiting Kate at her home he finds the tramp, who has recovered from the fall over the cliff, proclaiming himself as the husband of the present Mrs. Armstrong. He recognizes the tramp as Keets, a deserter of the U. S. army, and denounces him. The old tramp then confesses his identity and upon seeing the stepson upon the scene, he accuses him of having robbed him and thrown him from the cliff. Kate, upon hearing that her fiance is a thief, breaks her engagement and accepts the attentions of the man who had saved her from a watery grave.

SOLAX.

PERCY AND HIS SQUAW (Oct. 25).—By mistake Percy puts on his room mate's coat, in which is a photograph of a pretty girl. Percy's sweetheart, Vera, by accident sees the photo and demands to know who it is Percy don't know. Vera, thinking she has been deceived, gives Percy her engagement ring and tells him to go. Heartbroken, Percy leaves for the West. Later on he gets lost in the woods and don't know which way to go. He hears a scream, and after a desperate struggle kills a big bear that had attacked an Indian squaw. Sunshine, the squaw, embraces him and takes him to her camp. She tells her father, Thunder Cloud, who is the Chief, how Percy saved her life, whereupon he is greatly admired and made a Chief. Then Thunder Cloud gives Sunshine to Percy for his squaw. Percy nearly faints. Later on he leaves the camp, with Sunshine following. He tries several times to bribe Indians to take Sunshine, but is unsuccessful, and also tries to kill himself, but is saved by Sunshine. Next we see Percy and his squaw at a cowboy tavern, where they are met by Vera, who embraces Percy, but is pushed away by the squaw. Lone Wolf, long in love with Sunshine, appears and leads her away. Percy explains to Vera and both are happy.

FOR BIG BROTHER'S SAKE (Oct. 27).—Jack and Dolly Harvey are orphans. Jack, a manly young fellow of 23, is in love with Mae Stanley, who thoroughly detests little Dolly. Dolly, eight years old, has been keeping house for her big brother, sees that Jack will never be happy with Mae while she is around and runs away. She is picked up by a gang of thieves, who try to teach her to steal. As she refuses to steal, they treat her brutally and make her sell newspapers on the street. In the meantime Jack misses her and realizing why she has left home, he comes to the conclusion that he does not really love his fiancee, Mae Stanley. He hunts up Fannie Moore, a neighbor girl, who has always admired Jack and been a good friend to little Dolly, and together they search for the child. Several days go by without any success. During this time Jack and Fannie have become sweethearts. At last Jack finds his little sister in the hands of ruffians and after a fight takes her home. Jack and Fannie are married and all three are very happy.

RELIANCE.

THE TEST OF A MAN (Oct. 28).—Fred Allen and George Barr are in love with Grace Winters. Allen is favored, though he is inclined to fast companions. He promises Grace never to drink, but is persuaded by friends to join them in a jollification. While intoxicated he meets Grace, and she, in mortification and anger, breaks her engagement and marries Barr. Allen feels keenly the loss of her love, loses interest in life and becomes a derelict. Barr is secretly speculating with his employer's funds, and fearing exposure arranges a faked-up robbery. He is surprised by the watchman after he has opened the safe, dumped papers on the floor, etc., and in the struggle that follows the watchman is killed. Allen, who has been passing the building, hears the shot and enters. In an intensely dramatic scene he accuses Barr, and snatching up the revolver holds the bigger man covered, waiting for the police. His great love for Grace overcomes him, however, and to save her the pain of the disgrace he quickly pushes the gun into the hand of Barr, and when the police arrive Allen is arrested as the offender. He accepts a penitentiary sentence, and is seen working in convict's garb on the rock piles. He makes a sensational escape, unhurt by the bullets which the guards send after him. The great self-sacrifice of Allen preys on Barr's mind, and he writes a letter of confession to Grace and goes out to find Allen and bring him back. He locates Allen, and his nerve failing at the crucial moment, he destroys himself. Allen buries him and then writes to Grace, who comes and kneels in prayer over the grave. Through the heartaches and trials she has experienced, Grace recognizes the worth of the man who stood the test.

A NOBLE RED MAN (Oct. 24).—Puffed with vanity at his extraordinary success as the leader of the war party, and laden with the spoils of war which he presents to the chief, Red Feather asks for the chief's daughter, Silver Star. Loving Big Deer, she protests, but to no avail. Floating Cloud, whom Red Feather has discarded, goes to his tepee and begs for his love, but he spurns her contemptuously. Silver Star secretly visits Big Deer and a tender parting takes place. Floating Cloud steals Big Deer's knife and stealthily picking her way, slays Red Feather and escapes unseen. On account of his threats, Big Deer is suspected, and he, thinking Silver Star has committed the deed, falsely admits his guilt to shield her. He is about to be executed when Floating Cloud, overcome with grief and remorse, confesses. For punishment she is given a horse and cast out of the tribe. Big Deer and Silver Star receive the chief's consent to their marriage, and the story ends happily.

AN INDIAN HERO (Oct. 27).—Little Ruth is captured by Indians while the cowboys are in town. Returning home, the boys meet Lone Wolf, a half-breed, and proceed to haze him. Ruth's sister Grace, and her father happen along and indignantly compel the cowboys to desist from their cruel sport, and Lone Wolf is grateful. When Ruth's disappearance is discovered the cowboys suspect Lone Wolf and try to force a confession from him. Grace, however, has faith in him, and he goes to the scene and finds the Indians' traces. Borrowing a gun and a horse he volunteers to take up the trail. He rescues Ruth in a thrilling scene and starts back on a breakneck ride, holding the girl before him, hotly pursued by the redskins. In the running fight he kills a number of his pursuers, who make amazing falls from the galloping horses. The cowboys, hearing the shots, take a hand, and Lone Wolf, riddled with bullets, dies a hero's death as Ruth is placed safely in the arms of her parents.

AMBROSIO.

SALAMBO (Oct. 25).—Salambo is in command of the Mercenaries (hired foreign soldiers). Payment being delayed they make a hostile demonstration and the High Priestess addresses them. Salambo becomes infatuated with her and quiets the threatening men. Violating the sacred rules, he enters the Temple and forces his way to the Idol Chamber, where the Sacred Veil reposes, in quest of the woman. He is set upon by the holy guards, and tears down the veil and wraps it about himself, and while the priests and guards are spellbound with horror at the sacrilegious act he makes his escape. The Priestess, whose heart has been stormed by the fearless, dashing soldier, goes to his tent and persuades him to give her back the veil. After she has returned it to the Temple, amid the great rejoicing of the priests and the people, she goes back to Salambo and becomes the warrior's bride.

LUX.

BILL, HIS WIFE AND THE WATER (Oct. 27).—Bill was shaving when he discovered that he had no water with which to wash the lather from his noble countenance. He made a rush for the tap only to find that the water had gone on strike, and that there was a famine in the land. Bill then went forth to beg, borrow or steal, but water was so precious that none would part with what little they possessed. There was no hope for Billy but go further afield. He therefore took the first train to the seaside and returned later in the day with two large jugs full of the precious liquid. Meanwhile his wife has developed an awful thirst. She began to look at Bill in a way that made him feel nervous when he arrived, and she very soon drank both jugs of water. Poor Billy, he had a lively time of it until the water taps were in action again.

BERTIE AND HIS RIVALS (Oct. 27).—Jackson received an invitation to a dance at the house of the father of Ethel, with whom he is in love. He accepts with alacrity, and arrives at the ball to find that he has two rivals for her hand, and how the three suitors attempt to outvie each other is very amusingly depicted. At last, however, Jackson manages to propose in spite of the fact that the two others place the foot of a chair on his toes while he does so, which causes him the most excruciating agony. The proposal successfully accomplished, Jackson rushes to his room to bathe his tortured member, and presently falls asleep with his foot in a basin of water. The rivals discover him in this position, steal away, and shortly return with a large bag of cement, which they pour in the water. They then contrive to cause Ethel to fetch Jackson that he may lead her out in a dance. The wretched Jackson jumps up and discovers to his horror that his foot is firmly attached to the basin, which he is perforced to drag with him whenever he walks. Thus they arrive in the drawing room, where, as may be imagined, there entry is very sensational. All ends happily, however, and a final view shows Jackson and Ethel joyously united.

NESTOR.

LONE BILL'S LAST RIDE (Oct. 25).—Thankful that at last he might call the little home his own, Sheriff Kirby was starting out to make the final payment, when from Governor Wright arrived an order to escort the stagecoach from Big Run to Culver, as Lone Bill had been seen in his country. Reluctantly, Kirby handed the money to his son, Joe, then hastened to execute the Governor's orders, while Joe rode gaily away to make the last payment on their home.

Unfortunately, however, he stopped in at Dan's saloon to bid his friends good-bye, and there, although not recognizing him, Joe met Lone Bill, whose adroit persuasion soon induced the young man to play "just one" game. He let Joe win at first, then gently led him on, so that ere two hours had passed, the sheriff's money had changed hands, and Lone Bill had departed to don his mask and await the stage coach at the bend of the road. But as he sprang out and commanded the driver to throw up his hands, Sheriff Kirby and his men dashed forward. Springing upon his horse, Bill galloped furiously away, with the posse in close pursuit. Although severely wounded, the desperado managed to evade them by dismounting and sending his horse off the other way.

Seeing that he had been duped, the sheriff sent his men out in various directions, while he and Deputy Ward chanced upon the very path that Bill had taken, and soon discovered their man hiding near a large tree. At the first shot, the desperado fell and lay motionless, nor did he move when Kirby touched him with his boot; but no sooner were their backs turned, than the command came to throw up their hands, and upon wheeling, found themselves looking into the muzzle of Lone Bill's six-shooter.

Quickly the desperado took possession of the sheriff's horse; but had scarcely gone half a mile, when he lost consciousness; and it was only when brought to the Kirby home that Bill managed to slip to the ground, where kind-hearted Mrs. Kirby soon found the wounded man and helped him into the house. Here, from another room, he heard Joe's broken confession to his mother of the gambling, so that ere the Angel of Death claimed him, Lone Bill had an opportunity to repair at least a part of the havoc he had wrought.

MUTT AND JEFF DISCOVER A WONDERFUL REMEDY (Oct. 28).—Dr. Fakewell has cleaned up $30,000 and is now in search of pastures new. Who'll fill his place? Why, Mutt and Jeff. So they take up their "working" quarters at the old stand, that is, Dr. Fakewell's late office.

The electrician in charge is glad to decamp; so he pockets whatever cash Mutt and Jeff can spare, shows them the workings of the wonderful machinery with which all the ills that flesh is heir to may be annihilated and "vamooses."

The first patient is an old man, who has not walked in twenty years. Jeff plays doctor while Mutt manipulates the electric wires from behind the screen. With a yell, the old chap springs up and discovers that he is cured and dances away, leaving behind a goodly sum of money.

The news of this wonderful cure spreads like wildfire, and a poor devil on crutches, who has tried everything in vain, decides to see the new doctors. He finds them still busy counting the "mazuma."

Jeff gets busy over the new victim with the aid of a mallet, and, finding the case rather hopeless, takes fifty dollars for the examination and demands two hundred bones for treatment. The patient is willing, in fact he says they can make him an extra charge should they cure him. An extra charge? Why certainly! Mutt is not going to be stingy with so generous a cripple; so he not only gives him the full benefit of the electrical appliances, but uses the emergency lever as an extra charge. A flash, a puff of smoke, and everybody drops to the floor in a writhing heap. Kind-hearted neighbors rush in, and in splints and bandages, doctors and patient are carted away to the hospital.

DIPPY ADVERTISES FOR A PUP (Oct. 28).—His name is J. Lancaster Dippington, but his friends call him "Dippy" for short. The surname fits him like the proverbial glove, for, besides his apparent stature shortage, his desire to make his little chee-lid happy has made him "dippy" on the dog question.

Notwithstanding his better half's opposition, "Dippy" advertises for a pup; and numerous dog-salesmen, together with a motley crowd of muts, mongrels, curs, cross-breeds and miscellaneous bow-wows, storm his home.

A belated dog fancier meets with success, and "Dippy's" little chee-lid is made happy with a pup to fondle and caress. "Dippy" is also made happy, and, as the Mrs. refuses to share his happiness, he insists on sharing it with his neighbors.

While engaged in reading the dog's pedigree to a friend, the chee-lid and the pup disappear back of the house. The dog-catchers' wagon is spied in the distance, and "Dippy" promptly gives chase. This is "some" chase. The chaser is finally routed with a net and driven to the police headquarters. Here mamma and the chee-lid put in an appearance at the psychological moment, and the happy trio, plus pup, go home.

ECLAIR.

YOUTH! QUEEN OF HEARTS (Oct. 23).—Three jolly "old sports" are enamored of the same comely dame, one Mrs. Lightfoot, who is immensely amused at the situation. She keeps the three on the verge of distraction, by showing absolutely no preference. The fact that a young lieutenant is billeted at the home of Mrs. Lightfoot is a source of disturbance to the trio. They bribe the maid to carry on a flirtation with the young officer, and keep him away from madame. Apparently the maid is carrying out her part of the programme, and the three, rid of the common enemy, resume the quarrel among themselves. One of the old fellows accidentally falls asleep on a bench, thus bringing down upon himself the ridicule of Mrs. Lightfoot. The other two engage in violent warfare, and the victor, sheathing his sword, approaches his fair lady, overflowing with confidence. Alas! He is abashed to behold Mrs. Lightfoot advancing beside the dreaded officer, whom she proudly presents as her "future husband!" The three rejected suitors become very dejected, and in their universal sadness decide to become friends once more.

PERCY GETS TIRED OF THE THEATER (Oct. 23).—Percy and his wife are about to sit down to dinner, when their friend Harold comes in and invites them to the opera. He leaves them, stating that he will be back in an hour, which will give them time in which to dress. As soon as Harold has left, Percy and wifey leave their dinner and hurriedly begin to dress. In their excitement, however, everything goes wrong—Percy's studs refuse to be forced into the eyelets, and madame's dress will not fasten properly, etc., etc., and in the heat of the tussle they both become angered, and the quarrel advances to the flinging stage, and in this plight Harold finds his friends upon his return. As soon as Harold and his wife behold the cause of all their trouble, they set to work to wreak their vengeance upon his innocent head, and when the victim finally makes his escape, Percy and wifey see how ridiculously they have acted, and laughingly they fall into each other's arms, and "make up."

A BREACH OF FAITH (Oct. 26).—Antone and Luigi are sitting in the latter's cafe in Mulberry Street, talking of their affairs. Or rather should it be said that Luigi was talking of their affairs, for Antone was silent with thoughts of a girl, a girl far away, yet near to him. Giuseppe had received a letter with a very flattering offer to go West, but he cannot go away, because Anita, the only girl, is even now on her way to America, to him, and happiness. Luigi prevails upon him, however, and tells him he will take care of Anita when she arrives. And so Giuseppe, confident that the girl will be comfortable, leaves a note for her and departs.

Anita arrives, and Giuseppe receives her and welcomes her heartily. Anita is pretty and winsome and sweet, and her eyes—they are the kind that buy men, and Luigi sells himself. He is just about to give her the letter from his brother, when—he realizes! He tells her Antone has gone away, but that he will take care of her.

And the girl becomes a woman, one of the legion of them who have lost faith and trust in the men they loved, because Fate, or Mistake, so directs.

Luigi asks her to marry him, and the girl is forced to do so. And when he has attained that which he desired, in the manner of men, he forgets to appreciate it. He neglects Anita, pays attentions to other women, and once again causes Anita to hate the creature called man.

Far away in the West far away in all except his thoughts, Antone's thoughts wander; he wonders why his letters have not been answered; he worries, and at last wearies of the suspense. In frantic frenzy he decides to return home. He enters the little cafe to see Anita sitting with head bowed upon her arms, weeping with the abandon of one who knows only dreary desolation and the death of Hope. Recognition, a happy cry, questions, answers, explanation and they see the light, they understand, they realize! As they are talking they hear Luigi, returning from a drunken spree, chanting a ribald song. Antone conceals himself behind the counter. Luigi saunters in, and roughly hurls the woman aside. Antone, unable longer to restrain himself, rushes out and faces his brother, the traitor and traducer. Latin blood calls for vengeance; a great wrong cries for revenge; Antone strikes, and a Cain is slain by Abel.

AMERICAN.

THE LONELY RANGE (Oct. 19).—Charley Crawford, a young ranchman, marries the daughter of a farmer and takes her from the homestead to his ranch in the West. They are very happy in their love and the days slip by, unnoticed while they are together. But the day comes when it is necessary for the young husband to leave his home to look after his scattered herd, and after he is gone, the young wife, left alone, finds the absence of human companionship and the silence of the vast prairie oppressive. For days the only living thing that crosses her range of vision are the distant herds of cattle, and unused to being alone she becomes melancholy.

In the course of their work, her husband and his companions come upon a ranger, whose horse has fallen upon him, pinning him underneath and seriously injuring him. Crawford's ranch is the nearest habitation and the ranger is carried to the ranch to be looked after by the young wife. She welcomes the break in the monotony and nurses the ranger, glad to have the diversion. The ranger's injuries are soon well, thanks to her care and he prepares to leave the ranch. He informs Mrs. Crawford of his intention and she watches his preparations for departure with much regret. Then fear of loneliness prompts her to ask him to take her to town that she may return to her parents until after the roundup. The ranger takes her on his horse and she gives him a letter to be delivered to her husband at his camp. On the trail they meet one of the cowboys, who takes in the unusual situation to mean that Mrs. Crawford has run away with the ranger. He rides to the camp and tells Crawford that his wife has eloped. In his anger, Charley attacks his informant, but the boys intervene and he hurries to his home to find the house empty and circumstantial evidence pointing to the truth of the cowboy's story. He feels the pangs of jealousy and the bitterness of life makes the hitherto honest man an outlaw. Months after the same ranger is assigned to the task of hunting the desperado down. He trails him into the mountains and comes upon him, but the wary outlaw has him covered with his gun before he realizes what has happened. They recognize each other simultaneously and the ranger drops his gun. All the bitterness he has felt surges through Crawford. At last he has at his mercy the man whom he believes has wrecked his home and he prepares to strangle him. A desperate conflict ensues and at last the ranger succeeds in mastering his adversary and he snaps on the handcuffs. He extends the letter written by Crawford's wife to his captive, who opens and reads:

"Dear Boy:—

"The loneliness of the range is awful. I am going home until after the roundup.

"Lucille."

Remorse comes to Crawford and the ranger understands. He unlocks the handcuffs and releases his man, and Crawford hurries back to his home and his waiting wife.

THE HORSE THIEF'S BIGAMY (Oct. 23).—Bill McCurdy, an outlaw, brings his second wife, a refined woman, to the ranch. Here they meet Pat McCurdy, a brother of Bill, who reprimands Bill for his duplicity. The shock is too much for Bill's second wife and she collapses.

Meanwhile Pat has informed Bill's first wife of her husband's wrongdoing, and together they ride to Bill's ranch, where they are told that the doctor who attended her has escorted her to the home of her friend, the U. S. marshal.

A few minutes after the arrival of the doctor and Mrs. Mary McCurdy, Pat, and Bill's first wife come upon the scene. Bill is about to shoot his lawful wife when the outlaws stop him and lead him away. The doctor and Mary plight their troth and soon are married.

THE TRAIL OF THE EUCALYPTUS (Oct. 26).—Mrs. Wilcox, a widow, informs the Rangers that the Vigilantes, a band of highwaymen, have captured her daughter. The Rangers are unsuccessful in their attempts at recovery.

Mr. Caxton receives a message from one of the Vigilantes saying that unless he proposes to abide by their laws he will be obliged to take the penalty. He throws the paper containing this reading in the face of the messenger, who returns to his gang. They start immediately to capture Caxton and his home.

Mr. Caxton's daughter, Elsie, informs her sweetheart, Bob, of the message delivered to her father. Bob, who is the leader of the Rangers, apprises his fellows of the Vigilantes wrongdoing and instructs them to be on their guard.

One day, as Elsie is waiting at her trysting place, which is the Eucalyptus tree near her home, for Bob, the Vigilantes manage to capture Elsie's father. When they pass the Eucalyptus tree, behind which Elsie and Bob were hiding, Bob jumps out and holds them up with his gun.

Elsie fearing that her lover will get hurt, clasps her arms around his, thereby causing him to drop his gun. The Vigilantes take the gun and are about to hang them when the Rangers put the Vigilantes to flight. Bob turns to his sweetheart and clasps her in his arms.

CHAMPION.

FIELD DAY SPORTS AT FT. RILEY, KANSAS (Oct. 30).—This film of Fort Riley encampment is a grand revelation of the work National Guard troops undergo. The marching of soldiers in gala attire on some national holiday is all the people ever witness in this regard; and they do not know that the soldier is trained in any other performance, except perhaps the carrying of his gun.

And if there be any doubt what our "boys" can do one look at this picture, of their work on the Pawnee Flats, will be a convincing answer to the question. In the target drills we behold the amazing accuracy of our gunners.

They were compelled to vacate the danger zone in quick order by the officials as they were in imminent peril of their lives; but the camera had caught the targets unedr fire, at a focus never before attenmped in picturedom.

This feature alone of the picture puts it in a class entirely by itself; but apart from the daring charges and counter-charges, the many and wonderful evolutions, bewildering drills, realistic sham battles with lumbering field artillery, this film is an educator. It is unique merely as a spectacle, in fact, without a peer, but viewed from a patriotic standpoint, it has a mission. To inculcate a feeling of self-protection, in that our country is in the vanguard as to military prestige. Every form of field sports, drills and athletic stunts are gone through with a vim and dash that make the spectator's veins sparkle and thrill with new life and spirit.

THE COWBOY'S PIES (Nov. 1).—There is an old bachelor ranchman, living not fifty miles from Silver Springs, Colorado. Two nieces and a sister pay him a visit. We see the party drive up in the carry-all and it is a cure for sore eyes to look at those nieces. Splendid looking girls with mischief peeping out all over them.

The auntie starts to bake a cake and the girls resolve to try a hand at pies. Out in the bunkhouse they see the forms of the handsome cowboys. Well, you may surmise some complications will ensue, something stormy and worthwhile, when handsome cowboys and dashing girls have a fling together.

Slipping over a lot of amusing incidents and detail, we come where the girls with cakes and pies have become the object of the cowboys' quest. These latter spy the girls and not knowing of their advent, or the manner of it, are after them in genuine cowboy fashion, in full tear. But the girls are their match to a certain extent. Their wild dash on horseback, followed by the cavaliers of the prairies in full chase is most exciting.

The boys swing the ropes. Swish! Swish! They whirl through the air and the girls become their prey; "roped in" as it were in true Western style. Then the cowboys get to "workin'" on those pies such as mother used to bake, and there is a good old time that beggars description.

POWERS.

APPLES AND DESTINY (Oct. 31).—Algy, a city chap, visits the country and comes upon a farmer's daughter peeling apples in the yard. He uses all his city tricks to make a mash. He gives her some advice about peeling apples and she tells him that he may go and pick some since he knows how to do it so well. Algy starts for the orchard with a basket and is soon seen up in the tree picking apples.

A couple of tramps come along, and endeavor to hold him up. About this time the farm hands learn that there are tramps on the premises. Algy, in fear of the tramps, comes down from the tree and runs for his life. The farm hands, thinking that Algy is one of them, pursue the frightened dude. Algy runs until out of breath and they overtake him in a marsh, where he has floundered in a helpless state. In a sadly bedraggled condition they march him back to the farmhouse, where he is seen by the farmer's daughter, who explains she sent Algy to pick apples and thereby taught him a lesson that he will never forget.

THE PROGRESSIVE BOOK AGENT (Oct. 31).—A foxy book agent comes to a general store-keeper in a country town and expatiates upon the merits of a book that he is handling. The store-keeper does not want to buy it and tells him he has no money and that he will have to see his wife. The book-agent goes at once to the store-keeper's house and tells the wife that her husband wants the book and wants her to pay for it. She gives the book-agent $2.00 and he leaves the book. The agent then proceeds back to the store-keeper and tells him that his wife desires a copy very much and for him to buy one for her. In this way the book-agent gets $2 from the merchant and starts on his way to the depot.

After he has gone the store-keeper notices that the book fakir has not left a copy of the book and dispatches his son to overtake the book-agent and get the volume. The boy comes upon the man and tells him that he wants the book. The agent gives him the book, but tells him that there is $2.00 due on it, whereupon the boy digs deep into his pockets and produces the $2.00 and returns to the store with the volume. At the end we see the book agent smiling to himself on the back platform of the train as it pulls out of the station.

THE PRIDE OF THE WEST (Nov. 4).—A group of cowboys are gathered about the railway station post office in a Western town. The mail train comes and from it alights the paymaster of a large mine situated in that vicinity. The paymaster carries a grip full of money, which is intended for the payroll. Johnny Archer, a cowboy, received a letter at the same time from his mother stating that the mortgage upon her home will be foreclosed unless a certain amount of money reaches

A WORD IN SEASON TO EXHIBITORS

The New Feature Film, consisting of two or more reels, goes much better with a lecture. The sound of a pleasing and trained human voice is doubly welcome when it helps your patrons to understand better and to enjoy more. In some places the lecture will be a novelty. The feature film, being a novelty too, needs both introduction and explanation and the lecture will supply both very acceptably. Wherever tried the lecture has been found a ready means of attracting the best class of patrons and putting more money into the box office. I supply—without extra charge—advertising copy for the press or for special folders, telling all about your feature film and the popularity of the lecture. It makes good advertising. Below is a list of feature films, on which I lecture or for which I will supply printed lectures at reasonable rates:

"The Passion Play" (Pathe) in 3, 4 and 5 reels.
"The Inferno of Dante" (Milano Films), 5 reels.
"The Crusaders or Jerusalem Delivered" (World's Best Film Co.), 4 reels.
"The Two Orphans" (Selig), 3 reels.
"Foul Play" (Edison), 3 reels (full lecture printed in Moving Picture World).
"Enoch Arden" (Biograph), 2 reels.

Coming great features are Pathe's "Hunchback of Notre Dame," adapted from the story of Victor Hugo; Milton's "Paradise Lost," 3 reels, by the Vitagraph Co.; "Zigomar," 3 reels, a very fine Eclair production; "The Black Arrow," by the Edison Company, adapted from the story of Robert Louis Stevenson; "The Discovery of America," by the Selig Company. I am booking engagements for these features now.

her at a certain time. Previous to this Archer has had trouble with another cowpuncher by the name of Denny O'Shea, over the affections of Julia Brett, who is known far and wide as the "Pride of the West," through her abilities as a horsewoman. Archer rides off through the woods. The paymaster follows that way shortly after on his way to the mine.

Knowing the contents of Archer's letter and the contents of the paymaster's bag, O'Shea evolves on the spot a scheme both of revenge and profit, and for that purpose, rides in their direction. Archer is troubled over the contents of his mother's letter and dismounting, sits by the wayside and ponders over how he can raise the funds. In a short time he falls asleep and the letter falls beside him. Denny riding up, sees the letter and the cowboy sleeping there, but hides when he hears the paymaster approaching. When he is near O'Shea steps out from the bushes with a mask upon his face and holds up the paymaster. The paymaster rides furiously back to the station and summons a party of cowboys. They ride to the spot and there find only the letter. They read the letter and at once discover what they consider to be his motive for robbing the paymaster. During this time O'Shea is among the cowboys who accuse Archer. By this time Archer has joined his sweetheart and while they are conversing in the meadow, the cowboys descend upon them and arrest Archer. Julia is indignant and determines that she will clear her sweetheart's name before they have a chance to hang him. As the party rides into camp Denny O'Shea lingers behind, riding beside Julia. He takes this opportunity to propose to her and suggests that they elope, at the same time displaying a large roll of bills to show her that he is well fixed. The money arouses Julia's suspicion and as they ride she stealthily draws Denny's pistol from his side and covers him. She then compels him to ride up to the others and they accuse him of being the thief. The money is examined and identified by the paymaster as that which was taken from him. This settles all doubt as to Archer's innocence, and the rope is transferred from his neck to the neck of Denny O'Shea. They lead him off exclaiming: "Hang the Mick!"

GREAT NORTHERN.

THE VICISSITUDES OF FATE (Oct. 28).—Charles, a young trusted clerk, is in love with his employer's daughter, and while talking to her in the office one day, a draught of wind carries away unnoticed several of the bank notes which he had just been busy counting. Their pleasant tete-a-tete is interrupted by the entrance of the girl's father, who sends his daughter away and proceeds to check up the work of the young man. He finds a shortage of $75.00, and demands an explanation as to the missing money. The young fellow ,unable to give a satisfactory reply, is accused of stealing the amount, and is instanly discharged, in spite of his protestations of innocence. Arriving at his home, he breaks the ill tidings to his mother and father expecting sympathy, but although his mother clings to him and declares her belief in his innocence, his father turns him out of the house. Charles, in his dejected wanderings from home strays near the docks, and becomes friendly with the captain of a sailing vesel. He gets a free passage to a new country where, ere long, he is seeking employment. Having no credentials, however, he fails to find a position. Being compelled to sleep in a shed one night, he overhears the plot of a band of thieves. As luck would have it, the plot is directed against the manager of a firm who had refused Charles employment owing to lack of references. Our hero advises him of the plot at once, with the result that the thieves are foiled in their attempt and arrested and Charles secures the coveted position. In the meantime, spring cleaning at his former employer's office has disclosed the fact that the missing bank notes were blown under a steam radiator, and the result is that when Charles returns, his innocence has already been established, and he gains a reward for what he has undergone by his old employer giving him his daughter's hand in marriage.

Among the Exhibitors

Chicago, Ill.—Burmeister & Eseau will erect a new $5,500 theater at 4835 Irving Park Boulevard.

Chicago, Ill.—Albert Amis will erect a new moving picture theater at 2805-07 W. Division Street, to cost $2,000.

New York N. Y.—Cramp & Co., have been awarded the contract for the erection of a new theater at 155-159 W. 48th Street, to cost $150,000.

Michigan City, N. Dak.—A new Opera House is to be erected here.

Omaha, Neb.—A moving picture theater, to cost $4,500, is to be built at 24th and Lake Streets, by J. Gregg and O. C. Fich.

Brooklyn, N. Y.—Plans are being prepared by Shampan & Shampan, for a new theater, to be erected at Broadway and Varet Streets.

Atlanta, Ga.—Frank T Montgomery's new moving picture theater on Peachtree Street, recently completed, at a cost of $60,000, is more than fulfilling expectations.

Cincinnati, Ohio.—The Empire Company has ordered plans for a motion picture theater on Vine Street, just above Calhoun, to have a seating capacity of 800, and to cost $25,000.

Fort Worth, Tex.—While moving picture theater proprietors raised no objection to the new ordinance providing for censorship of pictures, they are up in arms over the provision abolishing signs in front of the theaters. They claim a considerable portion of transient patronage will be lost through lack of any guide to strangers.

Newark, N. J.—Del Guercio & Gonnelli have drawn plans for altering the moving picture theater at 78 Seventh Avenue, owned by Gerade Megaro, and estimated to cost $2,000, and also of a brick store, one story, which Dr. A. R. Bianchi will build at 4 Sheffield Street, at an estimated cost of $1,000.

Milwaukee, Wis.—Architect Charles Lesser is taking bids on a $10,000 picture theater for the Kosciusko Theater Company, to be erected at Fifth Avenue and Mitchell Street.

Milwaukee, Wis.—Architect John F. Roth, Jr., has let contracts for a picture showhouse for G. Bruet, to be erected at Third and Chambers Streets. It will cost about $10,000.

New Orleans, La.—Charles F. Bode, proprietor of the Pastime Theater, bought the Schallnski property in Third Street, opposite the Rapides Theater, and will erect a small theater for his moving picture business.

Bloomer, Wis.—E. Nelson, manager of the Gem Theater in Chippewa Falls, is making arrangements for opening a moving picture show here. He has rented the building now occupied by Mrs. Laura Smith's restaurant and will open up about the 20th with the pictures he uses at the Gem.

Milwaukee, Wis.—Former Alderman Henry Klein will erect a moving picture theater on Vliet Street, near Twenty-seventh, costing $8,000.

Houston, Tex.—W. D. Whiteside has let the contract for the erection of a $10,000 amusement hall on Ashland Street, between Seventeenth and Eighteenth Avenues. It is to be a wooden building and is seventy-five by fifty feet.

Louisville, Ky.—The contract for the erection of the Majestic Theater, the new moving picture house opposite the postoffice, on Fourth Avenue, was let to A. Markham & Co. The store south of the present Majestic Theater has been torn down and the new structure to be erected on this lot will be joined with the theater now in operation, affording a seating capacity of 1,000 to 1,200. The new theater will cost from $40,000 to $45,000, and will be built of reinforced concrete and steel. When completed it will be one of the handsomest of its kind in the South. Another moving picture house is to be erected on Market Street, between Seventh and Eighth, on the site of the building that was formerly occupied by the Dow Wire Works. The plans have already been drawn for this building and call for an expenditure of $8,000. Mr. M. Bass is the promoter of the new moving picture house. At Twenty-sixth and Portland Avenue will be erected another moving picture house. The Portland Theater Company, headed by Louis Dittmar, will operate the new house. It is to cost $10,000 or $12,000.

Seattle, Wash.—A modern, up-to-date $100,000 exclusive photoplay house on Second Avenue is the latest big addition to Seattle's theatrical enterprises. The new theater will be located at 1412 Second Avenue, between Union and Pike Streets. John H. Clemmer, owner of two theaters in Spokane, and his son, James Q. Clemmer, owner of the Dream Theater in this city, are financing the moving picture venture, and they assert that their new house will be the finest of its kind in the West, and will be opened to the public about March 1. Plans for the new theater are already being drawn by Architect E. W. Houghton, of this city. The theater will be 60 feet by 108 feet, and will seat about 1,500 people. This new enterprise will be known as the New Empress Theater.

How Is Your Curtain Mr. Exhibitor?

Is it clear and light, well defined and of proper perspective and tone, and is it soft and pleasing to the eyes?

If Not Look To Your Curtain. There Is A Reason.

Daylight is natural and the light to which the human eye is best adapted. Daylight Curtains are so constructed as to reflect the most natural rays of light and to produce the fine details of the picture.

Let Me Give You A Tisdale Daylight Curtain.

Free of expense to one Exhibitor in each city.

Tell your picture machine man that you must have a

KIMBLE
VARIABLE-SPEED SINGLE-PHASE MOTOR
on the next machine you buy.

He'll give it to you if you insist; some makes furnish them regularly and exclusively.

Tell your electrician or your central station man that Kimble Motors are alternating current only; and that they may be connected either to single phase circuits, or to any one of the phases of two-phase or three-phase circuits.

They are furnished for either 110 or 220 volt circuits; and call his attention to the fact that this little ⅛ H. P. motor requires less current than a 16 C. P. light and that its starting pull is less than its full running load.

He may not believe you, but send for our catalogue and our guarantee and show them to him. He will be both surprised and delighted; and will tell you that you shouldn't lose a minute; but get a machine in at once.

REMEMBER: Kimble Variable Speed Motors run at any speed you wish, from 300 to 3,000 R. P. M. and the changes are not by "steps," but by imperceptible gradations, as you push the controlling lever slowly back or forth.

This is the only A. C. motor in the world that can do this, hence the only motor that you can use that will make your pictures even steadier and more realistic than you can do by hand.

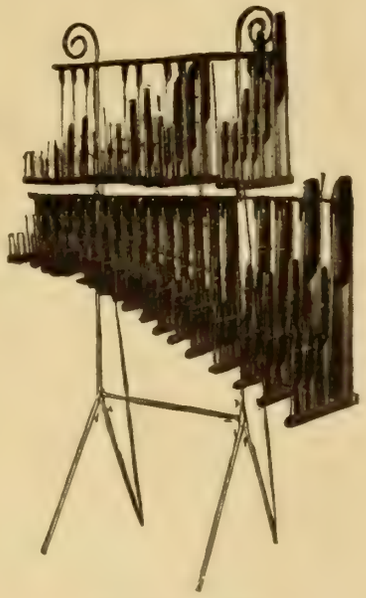
EVEN BETTER
THAN YOUR ELECTRIC BELLS

Although the Electric Bells paid for themselves the first two weeks they were installed.

So says an exhibitor who has recently installed a set of our ALUMINUM CHIMES

Our Aluminum Chimes have a very beautiful tone and a very imposing appearance as well, and can be played by any one musically inclined, with a few minutes practice, even without previous experience.



Aluminum Chimes

By installing a set of these Chimes in your theatre you can eliminate your vaudeville acts, and the price of a vaudeville act or two will pay for a set of the Chimes, which will moreover be a permanent fixture in your house and always an asset. As the tone is most entrancing it will be a long time before your audience will tire of hearing them.

Each instrument is complete in itself. They are made in sets ranging in price fron $40.00 and up. Our set No. 21, which consists of 25 Chimes, two octaves chromatic, C to C, is the most popular set we manufacture, and the price of same is $125.00.

We will ship you the above set or any of the various sets of Chimes which we manufacture, C. O. D., with privilege of examination and 5 days trial upon receipt of $10.00 as a guarantee of good faith, and, should the Chimes not be satisfactory in every way, sam may be returned at our expense. Be progressive and get in the band wagon now!

Your money back if not entirely satisfied.

$100,000,00 guarantees this proposition.

AT THE DEATH BED—A Scene from "Right or Wrong?"

RIGHT OR WRONG?

A Confederate soldier receives news of his mother's critical illness, but to reach her side has to steal through the opposing force's line. A Union soldier spies him, trails him to the house and rushes in to make the arrest, but is pitied by the scene he interrupts—the last embrace of mother and son. He hesitates whether to obey his conscience, which prompts him to free the Confederate, or his duty, which calls upon him to arrest the man. One has to see this picture to judge if his final course of action be Right, or Wrong.

THE SIGNS OF SUCCESS

"Standing room only" is the sign the theatre owner would like to have always displayed. It spells SUCCESS in capitals. For the M. P. exhibitor there is no surer way of keeping S. R. O. sign on view than to equip his theatre with POWER'S CAMERAGRAPH No. 6.

The number of theatres using POWER'S No. 6 increases daily in proportion to those using other makes of machines. This popularity shows the steadily increasing recognition by exhibitors that POWERS No. 6 is BEST. Best for the exhibitor; best for the operator; best for the dealer.

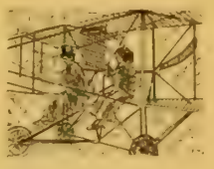
The HIGHER The FEWER

An Elopement By Aeroplane

A NOVEL COMEDY

Released Tuesday, November 14



A prize fighter carries away in an aeroplane an unwilling sweetheart, because the higher you go the fewer are the rivals.

Have you ever had something which was really good and yet which you were loath to praise because you were afraid some one would question the truth of your enthusiastic opinion?

That is exactly how we feel about "THE HIGHER THE FEWER." It is a comedy of the Willie Collier type. Refined, clean and full of novel and delicate comedy situations.

THE MISSING HEIR

Released Tuesday, November 7th

A dumbwaiter is the silent vehicle used by a wide-awake newsgirl, and a good natured janitor, with which to ride the missing heir, a child of the streets, into his fortune and thus frustrate the plans of an avaricious Italian and a calculating relation.

The waif is an heir to a fortune, bequeathed to him by a repentant grandfather who at the time of his death is ignorant of his grandchild's whereabouts. The waif is the offspring of a disinherited son.

The Last of the Mohicans

From the Novel by James Fenimore Cooper

Released Friday, November 10th

This Cooper novel has been declared "the greatest Indian story ever written." It is a story of Indian cunning, daring, ruthlessness, devotion, revengefulness, superstitions and reserve. It is the most vivid protrayal ever attempted of the "classical" Indian in his own environments in the year 1757.

The story revolves about two young women who, in an attempt to reach their father stationed at a fort in the wilderness, are waylaid by a treacherous guide.

A chase ensues for the rescue of these hapless girls in which the world famous Uncas and Hawkeye are the pathfinders. The unreeling of the story is punctuated with vistas of scenic beauty and convincing acting.

Four Clever Comedies One Bully Western

Oct. 31st

Outwitting Papa

(Length, approx. 1000 feet.)

One of the cleverest comedies released in months. A real hurricane of laughter from start to finish.

Nov. 2nd

Hi Feathertop at the Fair and The Right John Smith

(Total length, approx. 1000 feet.)

A bully split reel of comedy. "Hi" appears at a real county fair and his antics are extremely amusing. "The Right John Smith" is clever both in story and acting.

Nov. 3rd

Bill Bumper's Bargain

(Length, approx. 1000 feet.)

This is a comedy burlesque on Faust. Bill sells his soul for twelve hours of pleasure. At the finish Bill is seen in Hell, paying dearly for his short season of joy.

Nov. 4th

The Outlaw Deputy

(Length, approx. 1000 feet.)

There is much novelty in the plot and situations of this clever Western drama. Beautiful Western scenery and clean-cut photography.

We have studied the popular taste, caught the spirit of the New Era and release in our Weekly Program rare pictorial dramatizations that have a noble mission to fullfill, but an advertisement is not the place to proclaim it. It is up to you, to run them in your theatre and thus let the public reap the educational benefits therefrom.

Did you ever stop to think how easy it is to claim (FIRST QUALITY), (HIGHEST STANDARD).

This the Sales Co. is in position to do, as popular opinion is with us on this point.

Through our superior program of weekly releases in which we offer you the most artistic and superb acting we have won this popular opinion, created not only in the United States, but in all European Countries a greater demand for our films, thereby aided the public to appreciate the best. Years of experience and expenditure of vast sums of money have brought our releases up to this standard.

Mr. OWEN MOORE

Miss MARY PICKFORD

"The Courting of Mary"

Mischievous Mary and woman-hating Owen, scions of neighboring estates, are brought together in married bliss by the wiles of ever industrious Cupid.

Mary's uncle, although seemingly severe, has a tenderness for a spinster of intertesting, although an uncertain age. The spinster will not accept Uncle until "that child" is safely married off first. This highly commendable result is finally attained through a chain of ludicrous and entertaining adventures.

THAT DEMAND FOR COMEDY

Is Universal. But—IT'S THE BIG, BROAD, COMEDY OF THE WEST they want. Not the slap-stick, tiresome, "Hot-house Humor" of the East.

American Films Supply That Demand

Every scene A Western Scene, pictured in El Cajon Valley, Southern California, Garden Spot of the World!

AMERICAN FILMS will increase your attendance—bring a better class of patrons—irresistibly appeal to any, and all classes—and—

There's TWO CORKING GOOD FILMS—"THE EASTERN COWBOY," and "THE WAY OF THE WEST"—dated for November 13th and November 16th, respectively, that you shouldn't even think of missing!

"THE EASTERN COWBOY."
Release date, Nov. 13th.

"The Eastern Cowboy"

A Rollicking, Rip-roaring, "one-long-laugh," picture of the efforts of two Western girls to capture a good-looking Easterner, out West on a heart-curing mission that failed! They didn't land him, but another did—and—but that's telling, and we wouldn't spoil the joy of seeing that film for anything. It's a Humdinger from Funnyville! Order it now.

"THE WAY OF THE WEST."
Release date, Nov. 16th.

"The Way of the West"

You know they have a way out West of getting what they want. Well, two old men wanted to marry off their kiddies—and they did—but not just as they planned! Anyhow—but what's the use. For genuine, side-splitting, clean-cut Western humor it's in a class by itself. Order it while the ordering is good. You won't regret it!

LOVE IN THE HILLS

A Tale of the Tennessee Mountains Where Strangers Are Unwelcome

The old soldier's little daughter has two persistent suitors. One, a manly fellow who tells the girl she will marry him in spite of all. Her other suitor is a good natured, shiftless chap, whose weakness are liquor and music, he being the village fiddler. He tries to get the lead on his neighbor by presenting her with a pumpkin pumpkin. He thinks this little attention should win her, but she has met and become interested in a young stranger from the big city, who is hunting and fishing in these hills. The fiddler, despairing, plays soulfully on his violin, thinking the strains may soften her heart—they do, but for the other fellow, with whom she consents to elope. Her mountain friend prevents this, however, by driving the city fellow away. The girl realizes the error of her intentions and accepts her mountain knight, just as the fiddler arrives to renew his suit, aided by the pumpkin. He might have exclaimed "Well, I'll be darned," but he simply ejaculates "Oh! Pumpkins."

Approximate Length 998 Feet

THEIR FIRST DIVORCE CASE

The famous Biograph sleuths nearly cleared up another case. This time their services were solicited. Mrs. Grimm catches her lord, Mr. Grimm, strolling in the park with a chorus girl. She at once decides to get a divorce and sends his photograph with a letter to the "Two Sleuths." Meanwhile, the penitent Mr. Grimm has pacified his irate spouse, and to make amends takes her on a little trip. The sleuths, however, get the letter and follow them, thinking the wife is the woman mentioned.

Approximate Length 616 Feet.

RELEASED NOVEMBER 2nd, 1911

A Victim of Circumstances

It is hubby's birthday and the wife wishing to surprise him, surreptitiously interviews the jeweler's clerk to order a gold watch as a present. Her mysterious action arouses suspicion in the husband, who follows her and at a distance witnesses the meeting between her and the clerk. The hour arriving for the delivery of the watch, wifey goes to the door to meet it, and while standing outside, the door closes and locks on her skirt, holding her captive. Having no key, she induces the clerk to climb through the second story window and come down to unlock the door. All would have been well, but the clerk encounters the husband and it looked bad for the clerk for awhile.

Approximate Length 382 Feet.

4 REELS A WEEK

Released Wednesday, November 1 Length about 1000 feet

A Gay Time in New York City

Arthur gave his boss the slip so he could go with a friend to New York. Boss met Arthur's mother who was supposed to be sick. She was a widow—and 40. Now Arthur calls his boss "Pop."

Released Thursday, November 2 Length about 1000 feet

ONE ON RENO

A dandy love story in which divorce is an incident. The plot fairly tugs at the heart strings and it's charmingly depicted by Lubin's principal players. It's a la mode of the times and a winner.

Released Saturday, November 4 Length about 1000 feet

THE MEXICAN

One of the liveliest Western dramas ever put on the screen. Includes an attack by bandits on the home of two American women and the rescue through the bravery of a girl and her lover. Every foot is intensely interesting.

Released Monday, November 6 Length about 1000 feet

Aunt Jane's Legacy

A rollicking love comedy with a hundred laughs and a happy end. Wealthy Aunt Jane's nephews tried to appear amiable and win her good graces—and her coin. Did they succeed? Not so you could notice it with the naked eye. It's a cure for box-office debility.

"WILLIE WISE AND HIS MOTOR BOAT"

CAST.

Willie Wise..... William Wadsworth
His Rival..... Darwin Karr
The Girl..... Ethel Browning

Willie buys a motor boat in order to cut out his rival and has experiences with it which are startling. Some trick work adds in making this a comedy out of the ordinary.

"ICEBERGS OFF THE COAST OF LABRADOR"

Beautiful and unusual views of great interest and photographic beauty. The curious formation of the icebergs is well worth seeing.

Facts and Comments

AN exhibitor from a large town in Pennsylvania, recently visiting the offices of THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD, confessed himself puzzled on the question of applause in moving picture theaters. In places, where vaudeville is part of the program it has been observed that at the end of even the worst act there will always be some scattering applause, while the pictures are applauded only in very rare instances. The proverbial good nature of American theater-goers, who will laugh at an imposition, where his Gallic brother would foam at the mouth and demand his money back, is a partial explanation of this strange fact. That applause has no real value as a criterion of merit may be inferred from the circumstance that perfect whirlwinds of it have often swept through these misfit parlors of amusement just before creditors and sheriffs descended upon them. Indeed applause has little value as an indicator of popular approval. Ten men clapping their hands with vigor do by no means represent the hundreds who remain silent. An experienced exhibitor will be able to gauge the worth of applause, to know whether it is spontaneous, coming as a natural tribute from every part of the house or whether it is nothing more than the discharging of steam by a few boisterous individuals.

In some localities, notably in this city of New York, noisy applause has become a habit, which is distinctly annoying to the majority of patrons. The applause is very far from being a genuine expression of pleasure at the picture, but only an expression of that rowdyism, which in some form or other crops out in so many public entertainments in this city. Such applause is a mockery as well as a nuisance and should be discouraged, if necessary with the aid of the police. It turns a clean and decent form of amusement into what the New Yorkers so aptly call a "rough house." It accounts for the fact, that there are so very few moving picture houses here, which attract the most desirable classes. The proud and just boast of many Western and Southern exhibitors, that their patrons come in automobiles, is miles away from being realized in the city and county of New York.

THE number of scenario writers is estimated at about fifteen hundred. If a census were made of all who had written one or two scenarios the number would approximate twenty thousand. Assuming that the scenario writers who make a practice of their profession, produce on an average two scenarios per week we have the astounding number of three thousand scripts, submitted to about half a dozen film makers, who produce about sixty-three reels per week. Let us cut the sum in half or divide it by three or four, there is still a tremendous excess of supply over demand, for it must be remembered that not one manufacturer uses outside scripts exclusively. On the contrary most of them accept less than twenty per cent. of their scenarios from outsiders; the rest are strictly home made. Manufacturers are yielding to a natural impulse in preferring their own scenarios. They know, better than anyone else can possibly know, the capacity of their studios and their actors and the special talents of their directors. The outsider has no such knowledge and the presumption is against him from the moment the script reaches the hands of the scenario editor. The upshot of it all is that his pictures begin to resemble each other like eggs in a basket.

Sure of their market is most cases, justly proud of some of their productions, they are loath to believe that they need any outside help. They begin to stand in the way of their own bouquets. Now nothing is surer than that this supreme self-confidence and self-admiration will, in the end, bring monotony and result in inferior productions generally. New blood is needed, new ideas, new situations, new plots, new scenery. The amateur scenario writer may be ignorant of technique, but so at one time were the scenario editors, producers and directors. They had nothing to begin with but talent and industry. Talent and industry can never be monopolies. They are being constantly renewed in the economy of nature. If the deadly monotony, which today characterizes the makes of at least seven or eight manufacturers, is to be broken and variety, which is said to be the spice of life, is to take the place of an everlasting sameness, the activities of the studio playwrights must be restricted within reasonable limits.

MOVING picture circles have been honestly amused by the strange antics of a Sunday sporting newspaper, which seeks to emphasize, as though it were a brand new thing, the educational value of the cinematrograph. An appeal of the Police Gazette for subscribers in theological seminaries could scarcely be more laughable. People looking for tips on the races are rarely found among the educators of the country. The attempt to make "Bunco Pete's" advertisement of sure winners harmonize with so serious a subject as the educational moving picture is enough to cause merriment in a stable of horses. It is to be hoped that the exploitation of the subject by the Gambler's Oracle will go on indefinitely for there is nothing more precious on a dull Sunday than a long and hearty laugh.

GREAT credit must be given to the corresponding secretary of the M. P. exhibitors league of Pennsylvania, Mr. Harry Megowan of Pittsburgh, Pa. When the papers of Pittsburgh took occasion to criticize moving pictures generally and denounce them as corrupters of youth, etc., all on account of a published report of filming the life of a wayward girl, Mr. Megowan at once wrote to the papers entering a vigorous protest and calling attention to the attitude of the league and its stand in favor of clean and decent pictures. If other secretaries would, when the occasion offers, take similar action the defamers of the moving picture, who are often merely ignorant rather than malicious would be taught a valuable lesson and know how to be more careful in the future. It ought to be the duty of either the secretary or of a specially appointed committee to answer all unfounded charges against the pictures and to meet the hostile criticism of the daily press. The friends of the moving picture must fight for its good name and leave no slander go unrebuked.

American Films Abroad

IT is said, that about eighty per cent. of the world's supply of moving picture films is furnished by American manufacturers. Do we fully realize what this means? it means that American views of life, American customs, American ideas, American morals are preaching most profitable and wholesome sermons in every part of the civilized and even the semi-civilized world. American film makers have the ambition of giving a true and correct portrayal of American life, as it is lived by the plain people of the country. Our ideas, therefore, and our morals are bound to make an impression and produce an influence, more or less profound, in every country, in which they are shown. The fact that American pictures are easily the most popular and sought-after everywhere justifies the belief that this influence is deep and lasting. To some extent every picture that crosses the briny deep carries a message from the new world to the old. Travellers in foreign countries are constantly struck with the adoption and imitation of American ideas abroad. One cannot take up an European newspaper, whether English, French, German or Italian, without being impressed with the steady process of Americanization.

The moving picture does its share toward the popularizing of American ideals and views on the other side of the ocean. The treatment of American women, as shown in moving picture films, is a revelation to Continental Europe. The delicate courtesy and the universal chivalrous spirit toward the American woman is inspiring to the sisters abroad and has an undoubted effect on the European brethren, whose attitude toward the weaker sex is often influenced by medieval notions even to this day. In criticizing an European-made film, supposed to show an American drama, a French paper justly observes, that the picture in question failed to catch the American spirit, because "the employees in dealing with their employer showed an amount of servility, wholly unknown in America." The American man, especially if he hails from the West, is often "breezy," which is an euphemism for rude, but he is every inch a man. The spirit of manly freedom and independence, a spirit that will never shrink from danger and will ever persevere to the end, is still characteristic of a great majority of American men and boys. The pictures that come to Europe impress more effectively than a thousand books so much of the American character upon the European spectator.

The democracy of manners is often annoying to people of refinement, but the democracy of the heart, the spark of brotherhood that shines out in so many American pictures, is a lesson as well as a revelation to Europeans. The sympathy for the under dog is another distinctively American trait, which Europeans admire, as it is bodied forth in hundreds of our moving pictures. Americans are daring and never lack initiative. They are not easily beaten into moulds. In Europe the old is revered because it is old and social institutions of the standing of centuries have proved irresistible moulds to most of the people. For this very reason perhaps they like to see conventions and time-honored traditions set at defiance, as they often are laughed at in American pictures. The genuine respect for religious sentiments, expressed awkardly at times, but none the less sincerely, is another healthy symptom of Americanism, that cannot fail to be refreshing to countries, where formalism has often choked true spiritual feeling to death.

The ministers, reformers, judges and other supposed custodians of public morals, who feel it incumbent upon them, to break into print with denunciations of the "wicked moving picture" had better take a trip to Europe, see what good the picture is doing there as well as here, and when they come back they will, like Edison, feel as if they must kiss the Statute of Liberty and speedily apologize to the great moral agency known as the cinematograph.

The Eloquence of Gesture

AS a mode of expression the gesture is characteristic of and proper to heroic times. This is the perfection of the histrionic art: To concentrate in an attitude or a gesture a passing emotion of the soul, to express by such means relations to other persons and to invisible powers with more significance than mere words could impart, to give utterance to that, which is too great, too general, too near to be put in language.

There are occasions of the greatest dramatic moment when the simplest gesture is more eloquent than a thousand words. Nor is the significance of gestures always confined to the drama or to pure comedy; the gesture is capable of portraying the solemn as well as the subtle emotion of the soul. This is true even of the rhythmic gesture or in other words the dance. We have seen Ruth St. Denis, garbed as servant of the temple, express in her movements the idea of consecration and piety with infinite grace and beauty.

While it is quite true, that the photoplay is not within the strict definition of the word, a pantomime, it depends for its very life on the eloquence of gestures. It has been held, erroneously we believe, that the Latin nations, notably the French and the Italians are successful beyond other nations in producing good cinematographic drama, because they can and do talk with their hands and eyes. There are many oriental races, who possess a strange genius for gesticulation, but are nevertheless wholly deficient in the eloquence of gestures. Americans, in whom as yet the Anglo-Saxon strain may be said to predominate, furnish probably more than eighty per cent. of the world's supply of cinematographic productions, yet no one will claim that Americans as a rule cannot make their hands behave. In the typical American there is a distinct trace of the saturnine. Washington, Lincoln, Grant were extremely chary of gestures. The average American professional or business man is seldom seen in the act of pantomime. Even our orators rarely avail themselves of that power, which poise and gesture often lend to rhetoric. A quick betrayal of emotion is not one of our national traits, we seem to have learned something of the Indian's stoicism.

How then do we explain the undisputed superiority of the American picture to that of any made elsewhere? Even in the Latin countries, in France, Italy, Spain and South American, the American film enjoys extraordinary popularity. Of course gestures alone do not make a perfect picture. Many other elements enter into a successful cinematographic production. These other elements are often present in the American production and help to account for its triumphs abroad. Without the language of gestures, however, no picture could be understood. The fact of the matter is, that it is the very infrequency and simplicity of the gesture that gives it effectiveness. When we see two Frenchmen or Italians gesticulate we take small notice, because we are accustomed to see the Latin races go through a perfect fury of gesticulation over nothing in particular. The gestures of Americans, or Englishmen for the matter of that, are, on the contrary, pregnant with meaning, because the whole man has to be charged with the tensest emotion, before he seeks to give it utterance by gesture. This is especially true of some of the good Western pictures. A wave of the hand, a turn of the body, a swinging of the arm means more than a hundred thousand excited gestures of a company of Frenchmen, Italians, or South Americans. There is a suggestion of the monumental about the gesturing of the Northern races. We are reminded of the simple gesture embodied in the marble or iron of the statue.

It is due to the actors and actresses, who interpret the creations of the silent stage in this country to say that they show both power and discretion in their gestures and their skill, art and experience has in no small measure contributed to place the American picture where it is today, away in the van of the cinematograph progress of the world.

History and Technique of Motion Pictures

From "Le Cinematographe," by Jacques Ducom, Translated and Adapted from the Original French by W. Stephen Bush.

Introductory Remarks—The author of the book "Le Cinematographe" is justly considered an authority on the moving picture under its every aspect. His chapters on "Motion Analyzed" and "The Synthesis of Motion" are exhaustive of their respective subjects and of interest to the layman as well as the expert.

First Part.—First Chapter.

THE BEGINNINGS OF THE CINEMATOGRAPH.

ONE of the first signs of the superiority of the human brain shows itself in attempts, however rude at design and sculpture, to imitate the outward appearance of the beings and objects, by which it is surrounded.

This activity is characteristic of man, he pursues it for the period of his whole existence and it is transmitted from generation to generation.

By means of this activity we are enabled to appreciate and measure the progress, achieved by those human intellects, that were on this earth before our time. Through the discovery of permanent vestiges we are allowed to see how in the course of time atavism was succeeded by civilization, we learn the moral, the artistic and scientific conceptions of the primitive man. We behold his constant effort at creating a more perfect resemblance between his imitations and the original pattern of nature, a pattern which is truly ideal at all times, but at all times hard to imitate for poor humanity, because it has never yet been able to penetrate the undiscoverable secret of its Creator.

To what marvels, to what masterpieces have not these innate longings given birth in the past, in the days of classic antiquity, during the Renaissance and at other epochs. The sculptors and the painters of those times have bequeathed to us such imitations and reproductions of nature, that they are and will be objects of admiration to all who can understand them from every possible point of view, whether of art, of drawing, of color, or of perspective.

The works of modern times are not inferior in these matters to the qualities achieved in the past, they only embrace more clearly the reality, but maintain no inconsiderable artistic merit and value. They apply more freely the rules and that scientific knowledge, which greatly enhance the resemblance to truth in the object, which it is sought to reproduce.

But all these imitations, so admirable in their delicate limning of the human figure, the skill of the colors, the artistic observance of proportion can after all do no more than give a perfect reproduction of an immovable position of a living being or the perspective, the harmony of colors, of a beautiful landscape. The illusion of actual life, of which the looks of a person, his attitudes, his movements, form an integral part, the almost imperceptible passage of the air through the landscape, the fleeting clouds, the wind bending the trees, the glancing waters answering the rays of the sun, have, however, never been achieved.

Great minds, disciples of science, have eagerly sought to solve this troublesome problem: Those versed in physics began to spell out the elementary rules governing the science of optics; alchemists discover the first properties of living metals, painters and sculptors impart motion to their conceptions, experts in mechanics make automatons and jointed dolls; all of them, each after his own fashion, seeks to realize his dream of reproducing motion. But—the secret is well guarded. Their efforts have had only poor results, but they were able to surprise their own times.

Among these inquiring spirits were some, who had discovered a phenomenon, which will engage our attention in the pages of this book; we are speaking of certain remarks, which make it plain to us, that the ancients were acquainted with the persistence of vision in the retina.

These observations led some of the keener spirits toward a solution, which permitted the animation of a picture by the aid of various elements, each representing a phase of the motion, which it was intended to reproduce. The result was an illusion, produced in the eye of the spectator, who fancied he saw one and the same image or picture, moving in certain of its parts.

This illusion is produced, thanks to a phenomenon, we are about to describe. Let us take, for example, as our model a picture, representing in the background a house and in the foreground a man, walking across, from the right to the left. We next circumscribe the space of the picture, which we intend to render animated in certain of its parts. Now we sketch a second picture, in which the stationary parts, such as the ground, the house and the trees may be superimposed upon those of the first picture. We will then draw the figure of the man exactly in the position he occupies when he becomes visible in the picture. In the act of walking, the man's motions, the places, which he passes and his gestures are undergoing rapid changes. It is then necessary that each of the new pictures present a changing view of the walking man and also mark the changes in the position he occupies with reference to the stationary objects in the picture.

We will now suppose, that we have a long series of pictures thus drawn and that by means of some mechanism we can superimpose one upon the other in fairly equal intervals, lasting at least the tenth part of a second (the average duration of the persistence of vision in the retina of the eye) and the spectator will have the illusion of seeing but one and the same picture.

If these dissolving views are arranged in a suitable proportion, if they succeed each other with the necessary degree of speed and if the means employed in causing the constant changing is effective a synthesis of motion, more or less perfect is obtained.

Up to a period of scarcely sixty years ago none but manual contrivances were employed in realizing the reproduction of actual motion in pictures. The men engaged in these pursuits were past masters in their art and their works still challenge our admiration. Compared, however, with the present day achievements their imperfections are glaring.

It was only with the appearance of photography about this time, that one could get a glimpse of the possibility of reproducing with an almost mathematical exactness, if such expression be permissible, the picture of an object in motion.

The cinematograph was born of a combination of the phenomena of the persistence of vision in the retina of the eye and the means of exact recording by photography.

We will not describe the labor it has cost to obtain the results which today seem so simple, but it is well to have the reader know the names of all who have helped in creating this new art; he owes them at least recognition if not gratitude; in any event, the records will be valuable for future reference. We will, however, refer especially to the lectures of M. Demeny, who has created the first mechanical elements, which led to the scientific and practical solution of the problem, which occupies us.

A Great Poster Display—How One Theater Billed Selig's "Ten Nights in a Barroom."

Observations by our Man About Town

WITH the fall and winter season well under way, many new faces are found among the managers of moving picture houses, particularly those of the nickelodeon class. Some of the old managers have disposed of their holdings to take advantage of better locations and open theaters of the more modern and enlarged style with a better class of patrons. Others have sold out for speculative purposes, the latter operation being based on an opportunity to sell out at a good price that leaves them a favorable surplus after investment in a new house.

It is opportune to say a few words to the new managers, most of whom appear to be beginners in the amusement field. The point in mind bears upon fake operations and the incentive to bring it out was a scheme indulged in by a Brooklyn manager a few days ago that cannot be too severely condemned. Sharp competition cannot excuse anyone for indulgence in anything that is unfair to the public. The picture house that I refer to claimed to have a service pretty close to first run. The lobby display of posters and photographs apparently sustained the claim and the writer went in to see the show.

* * *

The amusement seeking public is very sensitive, particularly with reference to disappointments, and emphatically so when there is even a suggestion of deception. When Harry Lauder failed to make an appearance at the appointed hour to give his opening performance at the Manhattan opera house, there was a spirit of chagrin and unrest on the part of the audience that was very disturbing to the management, although announcement had been made in ample time that the delay in arrival of the steamer on which the actor was a passenger was the cause, and assurance was given that he would positively appear as soon as Lauder could be hurried from the steamer to the theater. All the other numbers of the program were exhausted, and to make good for the delay the management added three or four special features at great expense. Lauder finally appeared and the show closed with everybody satisfied.

It may seem a little ridiculous to some when a case like this is cited to impress upon the management of a five or ten cent theater the importance of sparing no time or expense to keep faith with the public, but it is not. The principle involved is the same in all cases, regardless of the character of the house, or the attraction, and the management that fails to realize it is bound to suffer a loss financially and in prestige in proportion to the pretensions of his establishment. The picture house mentioned as having been visited did not present all the pictures advertised in the lobby and those given were not quite up to the release date the announcements implied. The most censurable part of the matter was that there was deception practised in announcing the pictures that were up-to-date subjects. Subsequent pictures showed that the announcements in the lobby were so arranged that the pasters on the posters of the later subjects were cleverly concealed, so that the public, without close inspection, could not see they were coming attractions and were not to be presented that evening.

* * *

A persistence in such tactics might not attract as much notice if the perpetrators alone were destined to be the sufferers, but as it threatens to undermine confidence to an extent that may injure managers that are conducting their places legitimately quite a different color is put on the matter. Many people who have followed commercial pursuits have been attracted to the motion picture exhibition field. Those who have had experience in it know that there is a wide distinction in the methods of operation of the two lines, especially in the advertising department. In the commercial line the public has become so accustomed to the advertising methods that they frequently do not take misleading and deceptive announcements seriously. One of the reasons for this may be that they are not required to pay an admission fee to learn that they have been fooled. Not so with the motion picture line. No matter how small the admission fee may be, the public feels keenly any disappointment caused by a management not presenting what it advertises and the affront is aggravated when the patrons learn that for the same price they could have seen the pictures they wished to see at a neighboring house on the same night.

* * *

Such tactics have been frequently condemned in these columns, but not for some time. It was thought common sense had taught all managers the foolishness of falsely advertising the attractions of a competing house to divert patrons to their places. No doubt managers of experience have learned the futility of such methods. In the case I have mentioned the manager was a new comer and, to the credit of the others, it can be said that no cause for indictment has thus far been found.

* * *

The influx of old time actors and actresses into the field of picture players has become very noticeable during the past few months, and upon visiting the several studios many somewhat touching scenes may be witnessed. A few days ago I saw two white-haired players whose names a generation ago were household words greet each other in a studio with a fervor that seemed to bring tears to their eyes and those who saw the meeting were visibly affected.

"Well, God bless your old face, how are you, anyway?" exclaimed one. "It is many seasons since we met on the scene of action, isn't it?"

"Yes," replied the other, reflectively, "many seasons. You were not so white-haired then."

"No, nor you. Working here?"

"No—not yet."

Voice in the distance: "Picture!"

Turning quickly the veteran who had first spoken said: "I am in this and must go. Good bye, old chap." The other responded "Good luck" and then shouted to his departing friend, "Speak for me if you can; I'm at liberty now."

* * *

One of the bystanders remarked that the pair were two of the shining lights of the profession for years, but, like many others, found it necessary to continue following the stage. When it was suggested that the motion picture business had proved a friendly haven for them the bystander replied that it had, but only to a limited extent. He explained that the actors and actresses found places for years in many of the cheaper stock companies and road shows, but the pictures have gradually undermined that branch of the theatrical business and have driven the veterans to the picture studios, which are not sufficient in number, however, to make place for all the old-timers that suffered through the stock and other companies going to the wall through a drifting of patronage to the photoplay.

"The employment of the older players," added my informant, "by the picture people is more a matter of sentiment than advantage. The parts for which they are adapted are not many and engagements cannot be continuous. Most photo players must be of the general utility character, and in many instances almost qualify as a circus performer, and that lets the favorites of our boyhood days out. But I am convinced that one of the agencies responsible for the swerving of popular sentiment to the pictures has been the disposition on the part of the producers to give employment to veterans of the stage when possible. The names of some old players now appearing in pictures would have been a big boost to the photoplay a generation ago. Many of the older people have forgotten them now and the rising generation probably never heard of them.

George Dixon, probably one of the best known and most popular motion picture machine operators in Greater New York, was met the other day attired in a uniform of Uncle Sam's navy. About five months ago he enlisted and is now honorably discharged. His short service was due to injuries sustained in the discharge of duties and he is to receive a pension. But he will not depend on this and will go back to his old line of work.

Advertising for Exhibitors

Conducted by EPES WINTHROP SARGENT.

A CORRESPONDENT whose signature is more ornamental than legible, but who gives a Wilmington, N. C., address, offers a suggestion that should interest the Independent press agents and perhaps the Licensed publicity workers as well. He writes:

> You will find, I believe, that many exhibitors will be glad to have articles on various firms, manufacturers, suitable for publication (one daily), as a way of making patrons and others more interested and familiar with the companies and producers. This refers especially to the Independents. The Association, being in the majority and older, are naturally better known. With the assistance of lobby photos of picture performers, some, what might be termed, personal interest has already been aroused, and some people are always glad to see their favorites. All cannot be favorites, but can be better known. You are in a position to write the paragraphs, and I would be glad to have them, four inches single column, one a day, till all the manufacturers have been dealt with, or at least the ones whose productions we show. Others, I am sure, would be glad to use them.

Four inches each of the various Independent companies is rather too large an order with the present demands upon space, but if the idea meets the favor of a sufficient number of exhibitors, we will run one paragraph a week, until the list is complete.

It is unlikely that there is a sufficient demand for this sort of matter, for even yet the average photoplay manager does not know how to "work the papers" and it is probable that few would use the items. The writer will be glad to hear an expression of opinion, meanwhile the idea is passed on to the press men.

Getting Items In.

At the present time the Vitagraph seems to be the only company on the Licensed side using press matter, a complete set of stuff being furnished in the bulletin. Some of the Independents offering bulletins give some assistance in the same direction, but many of the press men gave up the idea because they found that it was largely lost labor.

It is not probable that a series of items about the manufacturing companies would gain wide circulation, for the personality of the player is what is most apt to appeal to the small town newspaper man, and here the Independents have a little the worst of it, since the personalities of the Independent players is not "played up" as freely as on the Licensed side.

The man who can write a letter can write an item and he can write a more printable item than the average press agent because the latter has a peculiar form of speech of which nine tenths is superlative adjectives.

Most films are worth talking about. Talk about the films and the people playing them. Do not aim at the circusy style, but write your stuff as though you were telling some acquaintance about the film. Then take it down to the newspaper office and ask them to put it in. Most small town papers "eat up" copy. Try it.

Two Examples.

From a California paper is clipped an excellent example of what the writer considers good press work. It runs:

> A few days ago Guy C. Smith, manager of the Camera Theater, Oakland, while visiting Los Angeles, called at the studios of the Selig Polyscope Co. and saw Mr. Sydney Ayres, who is now playing leading roles in the pictures produced by this company. Mr. Ayers' opinion on photoplay acting will undoubtedly be of enlightenment to most of us.
> "I consider photo-play acting to be the height of art, for in it you have not the aid of vocalism, but must depend on pantomime to express your meaning and facial expression to illustrate your thought; while less difficult mentally, as there are no lines or parts to be learned, yet it is a much harder strain physically.
> "Imagine yourself going to some play in a theater in Europe, where you did not understand the language spoken. Could you follow the play clearly? No! Yet this must be all eliminated in the photoplay; 'each movement must have its meaning,' each expression must portray its thought so clearly that the story can be grasped and followed by the youngest or most dull patron of the photoplay theater.
>
> "I think the 'Heart of John Ba low,' one of the best pictures in which I have taken part, portraying, as it does, the life of "those who go down to the deep," a dramatic gem, telling of the rugged courage and love for his home, wife and little ones, that a sea-faring man has."
> Taking Mr. Ayres' tip on this picture, Manager Smith has secured it for his Camera Theater, Broadway and Twelfth street, for three days, Friday, Satirday and Sunday, September 15, 16, 17; to be seen for the first time, there only.

There is no puffery here, nothing about the best film ever made or the enormous cost of the production. A favorite photoplayer tells the manager of a house that he regards a certain film as one of the best. The enterprising manager gets the film and passes the tip along to his patrons. The item has a certain news value; it gives something more than a puff for the play and it reaches the patron. This particular stunt cannot be worked often, but work along the same lines is possible every day.

Here's a pretty fair example of the straight press work style. It is from Pueblo, Colorado:

> The Majestic has for a program to-day two features—one a Biograph and the other a Vitagraph. The Biograph illustrates the punishment of pride in "Her Awakening," a story of a pretty girl who is ashamed of her old mother, who is poor and has to work in a laundry every day in order to keep her daughter well dresed. A splendid story and one that not only sets a good example for the young folks but a story full of interest from start to finish. Another—the Vitagraph, "A Western Heroine," is a thrilling Western story of cowgirl, a band of thieves, a brave miner showing one of the wildest rides for life ever pictured and by the world's greatest cowgirl, Miss Edith Story, who was for a long time leading lady for the Melies company. This is one of the best programs the Majestic has booked for some time. Don't miss it; today and tomorrow only. Change again Saturday.

This is not so good as the other, because it is merely an announcement of the forthcoming reels—of interest to those who are interested in pictures but containing little to appeal to the outsider who might have been interested.

Dressing It Up.

The item might have been dressed up more attractively with a little effort. Suppose that the item had been headed "Ashamed of Her Mother" instead of "At the Majestic." It might not have reached a few of the Majestic patrons who were looking for the announcement, but you don't have to work hard to get the people who look for your announcement. Reach out for the people who are not interested in you and gain their attendance.

Carry out the idea in the introduction. Instead of "The Majestic has for a program," etc., give them something like this:

>
> With the scornful laugh of denial still on her lips, pretty Nettie Goodman saw her patient, loving old mother struck down by an automobile, and, forgetful of the false pride that a moment before had led her to deny to her fashionable escort that she knew the shabby, patient toiler, she threw herself upon the pavement beside the sufferer. It was a terrible wakening to her better self, but it won for her the love of the young man who had before found her only shallow and vain, a pretty little creature of pretense.
> This powerful moral lesson forms the theme of "Her Awakening," a splendid product of the Biograph studios, which, with the Vitagraph's "Western Heroine," which features dashing little Edith Storey, until recently with the Melies company, comprises the Majestic headlines today and tomorrow.
> A Biograph and a Vitagraph on the same bill is a treat to music lovers and you want to make sure you visit the Majestic before the bill is changed on Saturday.

You've got the reader halfway through the paragraph before he realizes that he is being stung and if he was interested in the story he probably is interested in the film and will make an effort to see the production.

Easier Than It Looks.

Don't tell yourself that you're not a trained press agent and that you can't be expected to write press stuff. It is easier than it looks. Try it a few times and you'll get interested in seeing just how good you can make your stories. Of course, you can overdo it and get too familiar or too sensational, but it is not difficult to strike a medium and you'll take an interest in your own work. It is more fascinating than the labored composition of the conventional "reading notice" and once you've caught the trick, you'll find it even easier.

When you can put a sting in the tail of the squibs, try for a little more ambitious work. Try and put over a quarter or a third of a column extra now and then. Make it so good it interests the editor and he'll figure that it will interest his readers, too.

There is all sorts of material in the columns of the Moving Picture World to give you ideas. Go through your old copies and make a note of stories that you can work over.

The other day the Kalem Company entertained its players just back from Ireland. It was also announced that the company would winter in Florida. There's the "dope" for a half-column article about the way the picture actors jump about the country. Here is a company moving from Lake Killarney to the Gulf of Mexico—four or five thousand miles.

Even the man who says he doesn't like moving pictures, and who probably doesn't know what pictures are like, will find something of interest in a story like that. Somewhere in the story is the statement that the Irish reels are coming through and that they'll be shown at the Gem or the Bijou or whatever your house is.

Don't say "Jim Smith, the popular and enterprising manager of the Bijou, has arranged to get these films regardless of the enormous expense involved." You're not supposed to be doing this. Say instead: "It is understood that many of these plays have been booked for the Bijou later on." Then the man who doesn't like the photoplays won't put the paper down feeling that it can't be the truth because it is so clearly an adverisement. There is not a page of this paper that does not offer a suggestion of some sort.

You and the Paper.

From Norfolk comes the statement that one thousand school children are to be the guests of the Bonita Theater to see the first reel of the Vitagraph Monthly.

That's good advertising. In at least 500 homes 1,000 press agents are going to boom the Bonita and the Vitagraph Monthly and—incidentally—the educational film. It's adroit work that will have a lasting value, but up in Syracuse, according to the Herald, of that place, the children in the various orphan asylums were taken to see Kinemacolor as the guests of the Herald.

The announcement of the Monthly is given in barely the words required to explain matters. The Herald story runs three-quarters of a column and is but one of a series. The street car company provided special cars and the press man with Kinemacolor gets a clean half-column of reading matter that is worth a half page ad., and he gets it at the cost of some matinee admissions. The idea is the same in both instances, but in one case two birds are killed with one stone and the stone is handed back to the thrower with thanks.

There's always some paper willing to take up any scheme like this. When you start something, why not let the paper in? What do you care if the paper gets the credit. You get the advertising and the resultant business and everyone knows, when it comes right down to it, that you gave the tickets. Let the paper in and work both ends.

Another Weekly Program.

It seems to be the small towns that bring out the good men, or perhaps it is merely that they find more room to work in. N. E. Chaney, of the Orpheum Theater, Hillsboro, Ohio, sends in a couple of folders of attractive appearance that give the star film for each day. He writes that his programs cost him $4.50 a thousand and that he gets $4 from the advertisers.

The front page is simple but in excellent taste. It was set up by a compositor who knows his business and the reading matter is good. One line is passed on to the others: "Presenting strictly high-class, personally selected Licensed pictures." In most places that personally selected line will read like a fairy story, but it has a convincing ring. The management is interested to the point of making personal selection of subjects. Whether it is correct or not doesn't matter. It's convincing to the patron and that is the point aimed at.

The reading matter is crisp and snappy, evidently written for the program and not cut down from the bulletin copy. It is good all the way through.

Mr. Chaney writes:

> I am a great believer in advertising, if done properly. I find that for a town of the size I am in, that it can be done very effectively with a nice folder program, something like the ones I enclose. This is my own idea and you are welcome to it for what it is worth, if it will be of any help to other exhibitors. Of course every case requires a different treatment, and what would do in one community would not answer in another. An exhibitor has got to make a diagnosis, so to speak, of the wishes of his patrons and then cater to them accordingly. I have been putting out these programs for some time, and have noticed a handsome increase in business. I have these programs distributed every Saturday, and one put in each residence in the city. I also mail out some to patrons living outside the city limits. Have kept a record of these mailings and find that 95% of them come each week at least once. I am working on a more extensive souvenir program for next month, say about 12 or 16 pages, on good paper, with cuts and a biography of the leading players in the picture companys, and also facts pertaining to the manufacture, etc., of motion pictures. My programs at present are costing $4.50 per thousand, and my advertisements bring me $4. I run a display advertisement in each of the three local papers every week, in addition to locals.

Matters of Size.

The folder is 7¼ by 8½ inches folded once to make a four-page booklet 3¾ by 8½. It is in one color on white paper of fine quality and the front page effect is obtained with border and ornament both simple and effective. Two advertisements appear on the back page, one at the bottom of the inside pages and one between the two columns of reading matter. The front is without advertisement. It is always an error to detract from the appearance of the front page with an outside advertisement.

It would be well for exhibitors planning advertising to find out what the printer has in stock. A decided saving may be effected in this way, as an odd size involves cutting and waste, both matters of needless expense.

MISS RUTH ROLAND.

A new face has appeared among the players in Western pictures produced by the Kalem's No. 2 California stock company, which is under the direction of P. C. Hartigan. Those bright and attractive features belong to Miss Ruth Roland, a recent addition to the Kalem players, from a recent photograph of whom the above engraving was made. Miss Roland entered upon her theatrical career when but three years of age and she has been a favorite of theater patrons along the Pacific Coast ever since. When but six years old she appeared in Honolulu and one of the leading papers of that city paid her this pretty compliment:

"Little Ruth Roland is one of the most charming entertainers who have delighted Honolulu theatergoers. She is only six years old and yet possesses many of the graces and attractions of riper years, combined with her childlike simplicity and ingenuousness. Orpheum audiences have fallen in love with her, and never tire of her fascinating personality and cute originalities."

The Kalem folks are especially pleased with Miss Roland's aptitude for pictures and already the picture fans are beginning to inquire about the new Kalem beauty. The Kalem Company has been particularly fortunate in its choice of its leading ladies. Miss Gauntier and Miss Joyce have a host of ardent admirers and Miss Roland promises to complete the trio—the three graces of the Kalem pictures.

Careful Review of Trade Conditions Indicates a Triumph for Pictures—Methods of Some Houses Criticised—News Briefs.

By James S. McQuade.

AFTER a stay of four days in St. Louis last week, I found much to cheer the moving picture enthusiast, and also much that tended to dampen his fervor. It was cheering to find that many theaters were attracting crowded houses by exclusive picture programs, at 10 cents admission, and it was disappointing to find quite a number of others that offer a mixed program of pictures and vaudeville at the same price.

It was all the more surprising to find these mixed programs in modern, well constructed theaters, when it was recalled that in an interview with a prominent St. Louis exchange man, about a year and a half ago, then handling the licensed product, I learned that not a single picture theater in St. Louis used anything but pictures. The downtown picture theaters about that time were not even permitted to have a stage. Now, in the downtown section, pictures and vaudeville are used in several houses and in the residential district, in which many new theaters have been built, one can find quite a number that aim to make vaudeville the principal feature of their programs.

It is worthy of note that no downtown picture theater using licensed service employs vaudeville, while some of the independent houses do. The downtown independent store theaters and the licensed theaters of the same class use straight pictures and charge five cents.

It is also worthy of note that all the modern theaters in the residential district, which offer a straight picture program, use the licensed product, while not a single independent theater in the same district uses an exclusive picture program.

It must not be inferred from the foregoing that all the modern theaters in the residential district, using licensed service, taboo vaudeville. Not by any means. The Delmar, Knickerbocker, La Fayette, Majestic and Virginia are exceptions. The Delmar, the largest ground floor picture house in the city, seating 1,000 people, offers three acts of cheap vaudeville and three first-run reels, licensed product, for ten cents. The owner, E. H. Pipe, opened a new house, the Olive, on Olive Street, Saturday, October 31, with a similar service. The Olive is an exact replica of the Delmar. The Virginia, one of the most beautiful picture houses in the city, owned by A. A. Busch, and built at a cost of $55,000, has seen fit to use cheap vaudeville as a prop. A strange anomaly is furnished in the case of the La Fayette, which is owned by the same people that control the Washington Theater. The latter house has stuck to straight moving pictures against all odds and through great stress of competition, yet the La Fayette combines licensed pictures with vaudeville, and of a very common type at that.

The question naturally arises, "What has been the cause of the influx of vaudeville to picture houses in St. Louis, in the last year and a half?"

It can be answered. The novelty of a vaudeville and picture program for 10 cents appealed to thousands who had been paying 25, 50 and 75 cents at the Columbia, the high class vaudeville house downtown. Moreover, these programs were offered in the home neighborhoods of these vaudeville patrons, and attendance meant no trouble in dressing. They have kept going and have induced others to go with them, but the cheap vaudeville craze has its limit. I was assured by several close observers of the conditions in St. Louis that the turning point has been reached and that cheap vaudeville is on the wane.

The source of supply of most of this cheap vaudeville in use in St. Louis is O. T. Crawford. Mr. Crawford is one of the present owners of the Swanson-Crawford Exchange. He formerly owned the Crawford Exchange, licensed by the M. P. P. Co. For over a year Mr. Crawford has devoted most of his time and energy to the building of theaters in the residence section, and to the organization of vaudeville stock companies. These companies are composed of performers who do single and double acts of the old variety order, the members afterwards joining in the production of a farcical sketch or burlesque. Care is taken, however, to eliminate anything objectionable in speech or action. These companies play the circuit of houses in which Mr. Crawford is interested, or of which he has control.

The great obstacle in the way of the successful carrying out of Mr. Crawford's plan is the dearth of suitable talent. That means the limitation of the number of his companies, and, in consequence, the repetition of acts within short intervals, a something which vaudeville patrons will not tolerate. This, I understand, is one of the reasons for the waning of cheap vaudeville in picture theaters in St. Louis.

It was learned that Mr. Crawford has developed a unique plan for the construction and operation of theaters. The site having been chosen, a construction company is formed. When construction is completed, an operating company is formed, the latter being given 49 per cent. of the stock for a certain cash equivalent, leaving the controlling interest in the hands of Mr. Crawford and his associate members of the construction company.

It was also learned that Mr. Crawford is ambitious to build a circuit of 30 theaters of his 10 cent vaudeville and picture type, in Chicago, and that work is now progressing on one of them, the Marshfield, in the suburbs. It remains to be shown what success he will achieve in this enterprise, in a city where a much higher grade of vaudeville than he can hope to offer has brought disaster to many theater owners, who are now recouping their losses by offering exclusive programs to their patrons.

It has been a favorite move of Mr. Crawford's to choose a site as close as possible to some good-paying licensed theater and thereon build one of his "cheap vaudeville" houses. The Orpheum Theater on Easton Avenue, owned by the Rose Amusement Company, is the latest to suffer in this way. Crawford is building his new house right alongside.

The disruption of legitimate business always follows the opening of a new Crawford theater. For weeks the immediate locality is flooded with passes, good for any day in the week, except Friday, Saturday and Sunday. Indeed, from all that I could learn, and speaking conservatively, this man Crawford is one of the worst foes the moving picture industry has in this country. But moving pictures will survive long after he has run his short course.

A Triumph for Pictures.

It is refreshing to turn from the foregoing aspect, in which moving pictures are sacrificed to commercialism, to one that reveals their artistic and many-sided attractiveness, when intelligently and capably exhibited. And it is especially gratifying in this aspect to center attention on an exhibitor, whose loyalty to moving pictures has never faltered, since he projected his first picture on a screen. I refer to William Sievers, secretary and treasurer of the Grand Central Amusement Company, and manager and part owner of the Grand Central Theater, on Sixth Avenue and Market Street.

In September, 1909, in a circular letter to the exhibitors of St. Louis, advising them on the stand to be taken in connection with a bill that had been introduced in the House of Delegates to amend the then existing ordinance regulating picture machine exhibitors, Mr. Sievers stated: "We think it is good business policy to keep the moving picture business separated from the vaudeville or theatrical business. If a person wants vaudeville or theatricals, let him go to a theater where he is compelled to pay a price commensurate with the cost of the production. It is impossible to exhibit vaudeville or theatrical performances at the prices ordinarily charged for moving picture exhibitions. Then the public will also understand, when they go to a moving picture theater, that they will see moving pictures only."

Again, in another paragraph of the same circular, he asserted: "If vaudeville is introduced, it will be a very difficult proposition to get good vaudeville performers. It will be difficult because the better vaudeville talent is always contracted for in such a way as to forbid their appearance at any house not belonging to the vaudeville circuit, and it will be difficult because the salaries which such performers demand are prohibitive in the moving picture business. The consequence will be that we will have to be content with performers of very ordinary ability, and many will probably have no ability at all. . . . This feature of the business will grow from bad to worse, and will soon be an injury to the moving picture business. Such vaudeville will also tend to bring our business into disrepute; it will have a downward tendency—a tendency in some places towards immorality."

Mr. Sievers takes the same stand to-day, and he is more strongly convinced than ever that a well selected picture program, properly presented, will hold its own against other amusements and make money, providing the theater has the right location. But he rightly and justly believes, since he has elected to stand or fall with a straight picture program, that no nearby competitor using a mixed program should be furnished with a picture service that will damage and possibly ruin his business. His loyalty to pictures, if it is to be preserved, demands that he shall not be sacrificed to commercialism.

I have been in many picture theaters and have seen many picture shows, but I am compelled to acknowledge that the Grand Central presents pictures in a manner that places it in a class by itself. I have seen as well projected pictures, perhaps better, but the musical programs, arranged for each picture and the elaborate sound effects excel any that I can recall. Lyman H. Howe, when in Chicago, surprised people by his sound effects. Manager Sievers can go him one better, and then, in addition, he has the electrifying musical accompaniments which Howe wholly lacked. And all for 10 cents, while Howe charged 25, 35 and 50 cents.

It is not that the Grand Central has a large orchestra, for there are only three instruments, but it is due to the talented musician who presides at the large pipe organ (it cost $2,500) that the playing of the pictures at this house gives to the program a compelling interest for picture lovers. When I first heard D. S. DeCarlisle (that is the name) play the organ, he was accompanying the projection of "Ordered to Move On," part of a split reel by Eclipse. In that affecting and beautifully filmed story of the talented boy violinist,

D. S. DeCarlisle.

Mr. DeCarlisle imitated a violin solo on the keys so accurately and with such pathos that one seemed to participate actually in the scenes of the film. The two arts—the art of the musician and the art of the picture maker—blended so harmoniously that the effect on the mind was much the same as that of rainbow hues on the retina.

The Organist of the Grand Central.

Mr. DeCarlisle has made a study of the violin, piano and organ, and of harmony, counterpoint and instrumentation. For several years he was orchestral conductor with various operatic and theatrical organizations, traveling extensively and conducting successfully in all the principal cities. He was organist and conductor of the Cathedral of St. Louis from 1899 to 1904 and held a similar position at St. Francis Xavier Church, the largest in St. Louis, from 1904 to 1911.

In that time he played everything from the simplest hymn to the works of all the old masters, including a constant use of Gregorian chant. In addition to his duties at the Grand Central, Mr. DeCarlisle does a great deal of arranging. His orchestral transpositions and arrangements are well and favorably known and are used by leading organizations.

In an interview with Mr. DeCarlisle, he said:

"The organ has always been considered the king of instruments, but, owing to the scarcity of organ concerts, many people here were deprived of the opportunity of hearing other than sacred music played upon it until our far-seeing manager, Mr. Wm. Sievers, installed a first class one in the Grand Central Theater. The facility with which I have made the instrument lend itself to the rendition of operatic arias, songs of the day, Indian and Japanese music, with many novel effects, has caused much wonderment and been a source of great pleasure to our many patrons.

"To do this properly, of course, means much work and care, for the day has happily passed when 'any old tune' from piano, orchestra or organ, will do for the pictures. The public is demanding better pictures, better projection and better playing. To 'play the pictures' now, we must place ourselves, in imagination, actually in the play represented; take all the parts as they appear on the screen and endeavor to get thoroughly in touch with the story, and make the music take the place of the words, express every emotion and be in time with every action. Sometimes I have found it necessary to use parts of twenty compositions on a reel of 1,000 feet. Then again, it is sometimes possible to get realistic effects from only a few pieces judiciously used."

At my request Mr. DeCarlisle kindly furnished the following musical program for "Ordered to Move On":

1. Home scene [illegible]
   "Gade Pastoral Motif, 2d movement" [illegible]
2. Street scene [illegible]
   "Hard Times Come Again no More" pp.
3. Home scene—Boy practicing violin
   "Vieuxtemps Reverie."
   Make same pianissimo as the boy does what the [illegible]
   last strain of
   "Raff's Cavatina" on the flute stops.
4. Street scene—Boy playing and his mother singing
   "Angels' Serenade."
   When boy stops, change music to soft, plaintive [illegible]
5. Grand Salon scene—
   "Raff's Cavatina" beginning at 2d movement on 2d page [illegible]
   "young gifted violinist, Keberlich, takes your [illegible]

6. Street scene.
   Play softly till mother and son are on, then for [illegible]
   "Angels' Serenade."
7. Salon Scene—
   "Angels' Serenade,"
   still playing outside.
8. Street scene—
   "Angels' Serenade" continued, but loud again. Change to soft melody when boy ceases.
9. Salon scene—
   Very short violin imitation, then
   "Raff's Cavatina"
10. Street scene—
    "Raff's Cavatina" continued from preceding scene.
11. Studio scene—
    "Raff's Cavatina" still continued until boy begins to play [illegible]
    "Traumerie" till boy stops, then bright music in major key [illegible]

The Grand Central is not at all attractive when viewed from the outside, but it is located in the center of the old show district, nearby being the old Grand Opera House, Havelin's, the Gem picture theater and the new Hippodrome, soon to be completed by Frank Talbot, manager.

Grand Central Theater, St. Louis, Mo.

Sievers opened the house on August 17, 1908. It is thoroughly equipped with all the latest improvements. In the spacious lobby the photos of members of the stock companies of various licensed manufacturers are hung in neat frames.

The daily program consists of three first run and two commercial films, three changes per week being made. The seating capacity is 530 and one rarely finds a vacant seat during the show. The hours of exhibition are from 11 o'clock a. m. till 11 p. m.

A tribute to the Grand Central management is paid nightly by large contingents from the residence section, who come downtown to view the show, as they would a first class performance in the dramatic houses.

For sound effects Manager Sievers has all kinds of devices, many of them being his own inventions. Any sound, whether it be the growl of a tiger, the roar of a lion, the trumpeting of an elephant or the scream of an eagle, can be reproduced by the man in charge of sound effects. Once a lion's roar was so realistically imitated it made the girl ushers stampede to the exits, while, in their wake, several frightened women rushed madly. That incident finished the use of girl ushers at the Grand Central.

The St. Charles.

The St. Charles is in the center of the downtown shopping district. It was built a year and a half ago, specially for pictures, and is thoroughly fireproof.

A very good picture is shown here and the management is well pleased with the Sunlight curtain, recently installed. The very best class of people frequent this house and a line of automobiles can always be found outside during running hours.

The Broadway.

The Broadway is just across the street from the St. Charles near Broadway. Unlike the latter, it has a balcony. The house was formerly known as the De Luxe and was purchased about four weeks ago by the present owners. It seats 580 people and offers a good quality licensed service.

The Juanita.

The Juanita, on Juanita Street and Grand Avenue, is another theater controlled by Wm. J. Flynn and his associates. It has a ground floor and balcony and seats 1,200 people.

The program consists of Crawford vaudeville and independent service. Mr. Flynn told me that this house has showed to extraordinary business. The admission is 10 cents.

It is estimated that the houses controlled by Mr. Flynn and his associates represent an investment of $350,000.

The Cherokee.

This is said to be one of the most successful houses on O. T. Crawford's circuit. It is situated on Cherokee and Ohio, and will seat 2,000 people. It has a ground floor and balcony. The program consists of three acts of Crawford vaudeville and five reels of independent pictures, three of these being first-run, and two commercial. The hours of running are from 7 p. m. to 11 p. m. Three shows are given each evening and a matinee on Sunday. The house is not yet completed, but was opened July 1st and since then has been showing to exceptionally good business. The cost of construction and equipment was $33,000.

The Gem.

The Gem on Sixth Street near Market is owned by Frank Talbot. It will seat 900 people. Two acts of Crawford vaudeville and four reels of independent pictures form the programs. Admission is ten cents. The night I was there the house was filled to capacity. The first reel of Thanhouser's "David Copperfield" was run off and was well received. Much disappointment resulted from the fact that the other two reels were not forthcoming. This house is well lighted during the performance and fairly good pictures are projected.

Talbot's Hippodrome.

Right across the way from the Gem is Talbot's new Hippodrome, which when completed will seat 3,000 people. The lower floor has accommodations for 1,780 and the balcony will seat the remainder. Mr. Talbot advised me that his programs will include three acts of vaudeville, three reels of licensed pictures and one circus act. Film service will be changed twice a week. The stage has a proscenium opening of 46 feet with a depth of 41. This space will be quite large enough, Mr. Talbot thinks, for his circus ring. The house will be open daily from noon until 11 p. m. Prices of admission will be 10 cents, except the boxes, which will cost 20 cents.

The building is thoroughly fireproof, wood only being used in the doors and window sashes. Mr. Talbot expects to open the house on November 6th. Nine thousand Tungsten lights will be used to illuminate the front.

The Grand Arsenal.

A circuit of high class picture theaters, of which Wm. J. Flynn is general manager, comprising the St. Charles and Broadway downtown, and the Grand Arsenal, the Maffitt and Locust theaters in the residential district, use exclusive picture programs of the licensed brand. Each house is owned by its own company, of which John T. Fitzsimmons is president and Wm. J. Flynn secretary and treasurer. The men controlling these enterprises are of high financial standing in the community and play an important part in the government of the state and city.

The Grand Arsenal.

The Grand Arsenal, on Grand Avenue and Arsenal Street, is built of solid, reinforced concrete and is acknowledged to be one of the most beautiful picture theaters in St. Louis. It seats 700 people and has a handsome lobby, on the walls of which appear artistic, hand-painted panels. The operator's booth is suspended from the ceiling and is built of reinforced concrete, the steel rods supporting it being hidden in the concrete. The house is well lighted during the show and the projection is good.

The Grand Arsenal is in the midst of a very substantial class of citizens and has been successful from the start. It is the only house in the residence section that has been able to sustain a Saturday matinee. The hours of run are from 7 p. m. to 11 p. m., and the admission is 10 cents. The cost of the house was $65,000.

The Maffitt.

This house is located on Maffitt Avenue and Vandeventer Street. It is an imposing structure, but it is the intention to rebuild it and more than double its capacity. It is now running an exclusive picture program, but I have been advised that pictures and Crawford vaudeville will be run when the new structure is completed.

Grand Opera House.

The old Grand Opera House on Market Street is being remodeled by the St. Louis Theater Company. It is expected that the house will be in readiness to open Thanksgiving Day, with a program of vaudeville and moving pictures. The Grand has been closed for two years and it is hoped to revive interest in the old stand by the program mentioned. The film service, it is said, will be furnished by the National Distributing Company, which is said to be in readiness to open an exchange in St. Louis. I learned that representatives have been trying to get exhibitors to take stock in the exchange. Louis Cella is said to be at the head of it. Mr. Cella is owner of the American Hotel and Theater on Seventh and Market Streets.

The Washington.

The Washington Theater on Delmar Boulevard and Kings Highway is owned by the Independence Amusement Company and runs licensed pictures exclusively. J. Warner is the manager. Mr. Warner claims that his house is the pioneer of straight picture programs in that section. The Washington is a favorite resort for professional men, including lawyers, physicians, etc. Four reels are used daily, a change being made daily. These include a first, second, fourth and tenth run. Mr. Warner has a firm faith in the future of moving pictures and believes that the present craze for cheap vaudeville will soon die out. He says that the best class of people are against it.

St. Louis Film Brevities.

J. C. Graham, former manager of the Swanson Crawford Film Company, in the Century Building, has gone to New York to attend to his duties as vice-president of the Reliance Company of that city. His place is being filled temporarily by Sam Werner, secretary of the company. Mr. Werner advised me that he is doing a good rental business..

* * *

I met my old friend Dan S. Fishell at the Princess Theater, formerly a Shubert house located in the residential district. Dan is now offering Sullivan and Considine vaudeville and independent pictures to patrons of the Princess. This house has a seating capacity of 1,610 and Mr. Fishell informed me that during the week ending October 14th he played to 26,000 people at 10 cents admission. Three acts of vaudeville and three reels of pictures comprise the program. The projection at this house was very poor the night I called. The Princess formerly used the Morris vaudeville and closed after losing $8,000. That was in last June, I think.

* * *

I dropped in to see Ed Schwartz, manager of the Hippodrome Picture Theater, at 13 Broadway, one day during my stay. I am obliged to say that the Hippodrome is very poorly lighted while pictures are being projected, so badly indeed, that it is impossible for one coming in from the light to see whether a seat is occupied or not. The attendance was very fair and the service of good quality. Mr. Schwartz should get a new curtain as soon as possible and do justice to his really fine licensed pictures.

* * *

Mr. Fultz, one of the owners of the Globe Theater, at Sullivan, Ill., was seen at the General Film Company's office Wednesday, October 18. Mr. Fultz was satisfied with the business he was doing.

* * *

A. N. Beare, owner of the Gem Theater, Chester, Ill., was another visitor at the G. F. Co.'s branch during the week I was in St. Louis. He reported excellent business and is well satisfied with his service.

* * *

G. F. Weller, manager of the Orpheum Theater, on Eastern Avenue, was seen one day at the General Film Company's office. Manager Weller reported very satisfactory business. He is running a fine quality service.

* * *

William J. Flynn and his associates are building a new house on Grand Avenue and Shenandoah, which, when completed, will offer programs of Crawford vaudeville and pictures.

MICHELFELDER AT SUMMIT, N. J.

Carl Michelfelder has succeeded Steup Bros. in the management of the Summit Opera House, a photoplay theater at Summit, N. J. This house was recently opened by Steup Bros. with pictures and vaudeville, but did not prove to be a paying investment. Michelfelder opened on October 21 with "The Colleen Bawn" and did a great business. He will continue to run it as a straight picture theater, charging 10 cents for adults and 5 cents for children. The Summit Theater has a seating capacity of 500. The building is entirely new and has an airdome annex seating 1,000 persons. Mr. Michelfelder operates a number of successful picture theaters.

NEW PRINCESS AT NASHVILLE, TENN.

W. P. Ready, of Nashville, Tenn., informs the Moving Picture World that work has been commenced upon his new Princess Theater, to be erected with the especial purpose of catering to the best class of patrons of the photoplay. Beauty and attractiveness in construction and decoration will be aimed at and every convenience suggested by modern invention will be installed. It is planned to seat between 1,000 and 1,200 persons in the new house.

Reviews of Notable Films

"AULD LANG SYNE" (Vitagraph).

THIS two-reel picture is a picturesque story of the Highlands of Scotland based upon the sweet and noble sentiment of "Auld Lang Syne." Two typical Scottish lads, vigorous with the warmth of rockbound friendship, cemented with the association of membership in the same clan, are equally smitten with the blandishments of Jennie, a truly winsome Scotch lassie. The picture is rich with naturalness, scenery and location are exceedingly real, while the portrayal of Scotch life is most thorough and fascinating. In the love-making, Tammas is the favorite; Geordie's protestations of devotion have drawn from Jenny the sad words, "I do not love ye, Geordie, and must say ye nay."

Rejoicing in the assurance of reciprocated affection, Tammas unfortunately tells his boyhood friend and rejected rival of his happiness, with the usual result that an enmity springs up between them.

The sentiment of the picture now centers about the rejected and saddened Geordie. In a scene rich with artistic photography, he is found in his humble home alone with his dog, Jean, while the wedding festivities are in progress. His true Scotch character prevails and, taking his lonely wine cup in self consolation, he declares that "he'll take a cup o' kindness yet, for the days of Auld Lang Syne." In his reverie under the glare of the glowing embers a most effective scene is portrayed, which arouses admiration at the close of the first reel.

Beauty and interest increase with the second reel. Tammas and Jenny have now a bonnie lad of five years. While gathering heather, the little fellow strays away and is lost. An all-night search by the grief-stricken parents proves fruitless. Meanwhile, however, the little fellow has fallen asleep and morning finds him safe, though crying for his mother. Here the splendid work of the old favorite dog, Jean, is again seen. Geordie, starting at daybreak with his sheep and dog, is surprised when Jean comes to him with a child's tam-o-shanter in his mouth. The dog had found the boy and with his usual sagacity adopted this method of securing his master's attention. Instrumental in restoring the lost boy to his parents, Geordie sets aside his disappointment, and Tammas forgets his resentment; and while the two men are renewing the friendship of former days Jenny runs to the house for flask and cups, which are filled, and from which they drink "a cup o'kindness yet" in the name of a sentiment which has healed many heart wounds, and restored many former friendships—Auld Lang Syne.

The picture is deserving of close attention, all parts are most carefully and thoroughly presented, such scenes as those of Geordie sitting in the firelight are to be especially praised. The portrayal of Scotch life is creditable to all the actors and the story is calculated to fulfill its purpose of establishing the truth of an undying Scotch sentiment.

Scene from "Auld Lang Syne," by the Vitagraph Company of America.

"THE BATTLE" (Biograph, Nov. 6th).

Reviewed by W. Stephen Bush.

THIS picture, well named "The Battle," has in a more than ordinary degree that pleasing Biograph characteristic of throwing the spectator into the very heart of things before the first hundred feet have run their course. No need of the title to tell us, that we are standing on the threshold of the great war between the North and the South. Every inch of film throbs with life; the ardent spirit of patriotism, that in those memorable days flamed up in every heart, the young soldiers so gay and so brave, the matrons and the maidens, sorrowing and cheering by turns—all these are moving and breathing in the first scenes on the screen. Scarcely have we absorbed the martial rhythm of the picture when we are hurried into a battle with stirring incidents and varying fortunes, ending after anxious moments of dreadful suspense in the victory of the North and the union of a very real and human pair of lovers. The picture is about a thousand feet long, but so intense and natural is its fascination, that at the end we could only realize that it was all over by a special effort of the will.

The plot is exceedingly simple, but it is a simplicity full of art. How the audience will welcome this picture for its utter freedom from that claptrap and commonplace, which are the bane of so many "military" and "historical" dramas on the silent stage. The hero is unconventional enough to be frightened out of his wits when he, a raw recruit, hears the roar of cannon and sees comrades falling by his side. He incontinently takes to his heels, as many a brave soldier has done before him at the first sight of the bloody horrors of war. Possessed with an insane fear, he runs to the house of his sweetheart, near which the battle is being fought. The girl, at first moved to laughter by the altered aspect of the gallant warrior of a few weeks ago, at last feels that unconquerable hate and loathing for a coward which nature has planted deep in every woman's breast. She shows her disgust in a violent outbreak and orders the man she had promised to marry when she believed him to be brave, out of the house. He is still insensible to shame and at last climbs out of the house through a window. The battle, which in the meantime had begun to grow warm, here comes to a temporary standstill, for the Northern general in command has been severely wounded and he has ordered the firing to cease. In the confusion succeeding to the notes of the bugler, the young soldier has recovered the control of his nerves and rejoins his comrades without being suspected. The conflict gets hotter and hotter, as the signal is given for a resumption of the fight. Both sides are well entrenched and fight with desperation. The grouping of the soldiers in the trenches, their unremitting fire, the martial fury of their officers are shown with realism that produces a perfect illusion. The wounded general, who has been taken to the house of the sweetheart, where he still gives commands and directs the battle, orders his men to hold the trenches at all costs. The struggle is both stubborn and brilliant and as yet the chances seem even, when the cry goes up in the Northern ranks: "No more ammunition!" In this perilous situation the young soldier, who before had run away, but now is most eager to make possible volunteers to go through the lines of the enemy to report from General Grant either reinforcements or ammunition. Grant has no men to spare, but sits out a few wagons filled with ammunition and powder [illegible] to be taken to the hard pressed Union ranks. This manoeuvre has not escaped the Confederates, however, who set fire to the bushes on the road where the powder wagons must pass. Several of the wagons are wrecked through the heat and the sparks of the fire. At last only one remains. The driver is shot to death on his seat, when the young soldier grasps the reins and in the face of mortal danger brings the powder wagon through the burning road. The Confederates in the meantime observing the enemy's fire slacken and rightly guessing that this is due to a lack of ammunition, advance to the attack, while the Union soldiers are preparing to receive them with the bayonet. At this critical juncture, the much-needed powder wagon comes and the Union troops succeed in repulsing the Confederate attack. The young soldier, who has brought victory out of defeat by his heroic daring, receives the grateful words of his commander and what he prizes no less, the hand of the girl, whose faith in his manhood and courage is fully restored.

"The Battle" is a perfect picture in a splendid frame. I cannot close without a well-deserved word of praise regarding the womens' dresses and coiffures of the wartime period; it is in the elaboration of such details that the masterhand often betrays itself as it does here even to the last chignon on the young girls' heads.

LIFE IN THE UNITED STATES ARMY (Edison).

By Louis Reeves Harrison.

FROM its general merit, this film will probably stand unique for a long time to come in one respect. It is the first of its kind and may be the only one ever secured which shows the actual working of the heaviest batteries used in our coast defense system. There may be sixteen-inch guns in isolated positions, but the long twelve-inch rifles of the disappearing pattern constitute the most powerful weapons used in groups in our modern fortifications. This fact is no secret, as the forts themselves have long been open to visitors, and many batteries, notably those south of Fort Wadsworth, New York lower bay, could until recently be seen without entering territory controlled by the Government.

But, while those interested in the operating of great guns have witnessed their loading and firing in target practice, the great mass of people defended by these arms have but faint conception of their efficiency—the idea prevails that they are huge cannons throwing a costly projectile and depending largely upon chance for hitting a moving target like a battleship attempting to enter a harbor. The element of chance is, however, as nearly eliminated as in any exact science or perfect engineering construction—the chances are that they will hit. This is shown in the Edison film, where a moving target 30 by 60 feet, towed six miles out at sea, is blown to pieces.

This remarkable piece of camera work traces the shot from the moment of loading when the gun is out of the enemy's sight, shows the working of the breech-block, the sighting while the gun is below, the monster when rising, firing and recoiling, from within, and the firing from the crest of the parapet. It is something of an exploit to photograph the muzzle of a great gun when the shell is driven from it. The most powerful gun ever built by the Krupps has a range of less than thirteen miles; the rifled monsters completing for the sea coast defense of the United States and insular possessions have a range of twenty-two miles. The explosive force of even the twelve-inch guns must be terrific and the wonder is that camera and operator could stand it while near enough to the muzzle for effective photography.

We next see in the Edison film, from another point of view, the effect of the shot whether striking within a few feet of the moving target or demolishing it. All this is not only adventurous but instructive, an object lesson to those who glibly discuss the possibility of foreign invasion. Every interfering force of wind and tide is calculated in the range-finding, so that the blow struck is one of scientific accuracy and the effect on the intruding battleship can only be imagined when it is considered that the destruction of the French battleship "Liberté" would be that of a slightly damaged vessel in comparison.

It is cheering to see the Edison Company entering upon the productions of educational films on this side of the water, while the French are combining the X-ray machine and the motion picture camera so as to create actual pictures of what is going on within the human body. More than one producer is shy about assuming the attitude of a teacher—though bold in exposing his dramatic fallacies, he is almost embarrassed by the thought of doing good—but others are showing an open-minded spirit in dealing with the relation of moving pictures to education. It is now being appreciated that people enjoy what is really instructive, though it is especially liked when it presents some curious novelty or recent discovery. I have sat through a presentation of monotonous drama of the hero-villain-maiden type, where the hero and maiden embrace as little defects appear to show that the end of the film is arriving, and heard no other approval than that of children. Yet a subject purely historical or one of elementary science would receive a sudden outburst of spontaneous applause.

I venture, therefore, to speak for the small minority at picture shows who are uncultivated in stating that they more than the highly educated are deeply interested in attractively-presented scientific or historical information tending to raise them to a higher plane. Those behind in the race are eager to catch up; they are desirous of knowing more than they do; aiming down to them is an offense to all above them and of no benefit to anyone in the audience, whereas whatever is interesting and at the same time progressive appeals to all classes.

GASTON MELIES IN NEW YORK.

After more than a year's absence from the city, directing his company first in San Antonio, Texas, then at Santa Paula, Cal., Mr. Gaston Melies returned to New York Saturday, October 28th. Mr. Melies, who is accompanied by his wife, will remain in this city until some important business matters are disposed of, after which he will return to the studio in California.

CROAK NUMBER TWO.

By the Tadpole.

It is refreshing, especially to a critic, like myself, to read the film stories that are published week by week. It is remarkable to note how many of these comedies and dramas have the conventional happy ending. I quote from pp. 62-74. "Tommy's Rocking Horse" (Melies): "The rocking horse brought the little favorite back to consciousness." "The Slavey's Affinity" (Lubin): "A reconciliation was effected." "The Gambler's Influence" (Lubin): "Leaving his grateful pal to enjoy better fortune." "Told in Colorado" (Selig): "Kate explains and the lovers are happy." "Out-generaled" (Selig): "The forgiveness which they know will not be withheld."

I've chosen those examples from one page (62). The other pages yield about the same percentage. I suppose "happy endings" are popular with film makers because audiences like 'em. Most of us in films, plays, books, secretly like the happy ending, though we know, alas! that it is rarely true to life. As I write the paragraph, accident reveals to me at my side the book of the Gilbert and Sullivan opera, "The Mikado," wherein the latter character is made to remark, "It's an unjust world, and virtue is only triumphant in theatrical performances."

Still, false as it is, there's money in the "happy ending" film. The novels that have made the most money have had happy endings. So have the plays. Laura Jean Libbey probably makes more money in a year than Ibsen made in his life. Yet posterity will probably count Ibsen as one of the great dramatists of the nineteenth century; and Miss Libbey will, no doubt, be forgotten a year after her death. Ibsen's works were true to life, i. e., they didn't have conventional "happy endings;" that's why they were and are caviare to the general, that is, not popularly acceptable.

It must always be remembered that the Prop of the moving picture theater is the Young Person; and, consequently, moral stories and happy endings are at any rate politic, though they may not be true and artistic. Most of us think that there is enough evil in the world without having it emphasized in films, books and plays. Probably if a plebisoite of the readers of this paper were taken, the preponderate vote would be for happy endings. Just as of course we should all prefer happiness in life—if we could get it. On account of the indiscretion of a young woman with an apple, in the Euphrates valley a few thousand years ago, happiness in life is not often attainable, except, of course, in the spiritual sense. And there's painfully little of that about, or the churches might be fuller.

It is indeed obvious that the film contributes materially to the general happiness of mankind. Consider the state of desolation that would prevail if the motion picture film went out of existence tomorrow! What would take its place in the joyless lives of hundreds of millions of people? What indeed? Here it can be argued that the more happy endings there are in these film stories the more generally is happiness likely to be disseminated. Let us then have happy endings wherever practicable.

But as in all amusement enterprises, the ponderable minority has to be taken into account. It is surprising how many theatergoers like tears; notes of interrogation; abrupt endings; problems; and the dismal in plot and theme. It might pay some enterprising individual to start a theater catering exclusively to these folk. It might; I don't think it would. There's more money in catering to those who look on the bright side of things, than for those who are lugubriously inclined.

So that "truth of life" not being a paying proposition in films, plays or books, we are not likely to witness a departure from the existing order of things. "Things" have a knack of working themselves out in accordance with the fitness of things. The great public takes to that which it wants. And this brings one around to the conclusion that if happy endings were not desired in films, they would not be there.

PREACHER WORKS WITH PICTURES.

Rev. Walter Burr, formerly engaged by the Kansas State Board of Health to organize the Boy Scouts to fight flies, has developed into a regular picture exhibitor in connection with his church work. In Olathe, Kan., the hot weather during the summer closed the churches. Rev. Mr. Burr conceived the plan of holding union services in an airdome and using pictures to popularize the meetings. With the co-operation of the General Film Company, of Kansas City, Mo., suitable pictures were obtained and the project was a great success. Now that cold weather has closed the airdome, Mr. Burr has secured permission to exhibit pictures in the church edifice and the good work will be continued.

Artistic Direction of the Photoplay.

We all know the story of the goose that laid the golden eggs; the film manufacturers in this country seem to go about their work in about the same spirit. Quantity is the cry. Quality is nowhere. To begin with the scenario, they seem to be getting poorer and poorer. Very thin are most of the stories we get in the moving picture nowadays. Fortunately the photography has improved, more attention is being paid to suitable scenery as backgrounds, and these save many an indifferent plot. It is evident with the large quantities of subjects being produced in the films, it must be increasingly difficult to get good subjects. There are, however, many people, if they knew just how to go about it, would be able to provide good original matter. It would be worth the while of the manufacturers to send broadcast a booklet on the lines of Mr. Epes Winthrop Sargent's articles in the MOVING PICTURE WORLD on scenario writing, embodying a complete specimen scenario, giving cast of characters, scenes, costumes, etc.; further, there are now many amateur photographers, some of whom might have some dramatic instinct and who could select and photograph picturesque scenery and embody them in their scenarios. A person with a knowledge of photography would be more apt to know the limitations and practical possibilities of a moving picture than one without photographic knowledge. What is required by the manufacturers to-day is a proper system of working, instead of groping in the dark as they seem to be doing; sometimes a good picture and then a bad one, and what about the thousands of feet of film considered so utterly poor that they are never sent out? The action of the players is usually good, and the stage directors deserve much credit for this, but the director is a man who is given too many things to be responsible for and he cannot possibly do them all properly.

In the regular theater, we have the work better divided, first the producer for the general direction, stage manager for action, costume designer for the proper construction of the costumes, wig maker for dressing the hair, scenic artist, and, last but not least, the property man, whose duty it is to furnish the stage, supply or make all the various material things needed for the action of the play, ranging from a needle to an anchor. In the days of the old stock companies, the property man had to have a great deal of knowledge, for he was called upon to model his patterns in clay, make papier maché casts from them, as well as general carpenter and other work. The property man of a film making establishment needs even a larger experience, as although he does not make the properties required, he is generally sent to select them, and they should be of the right photographic value as well as to be correct in style and period. The stage of to-day is infinitely more exacting in its demand for correctness in details than the stage of the past. Witness the many spectacular productions of recent times. Unfortunately the usual film property man is one of limited training and his sole duty seems to be to run around and get the furniture, costumes and other properties at a moment's notice. It is doubtful whether he could make personally the simplest article, and has hardly any knowledge of the proper requirements. In fact, there is more than a suspicion that some of them go to get their goods to the firms from whom they can get most commission and whether through gross ignorance or petty graft, the resulting picture suffers, particularly in historic or period pictures.

What is needed in this country is the technical director, whose duty it is to see that the details of the picture are properly staged. The Eclair Company imported a man especially for their new plant for this purpose. He unfortunately died here recently, and it remains to be seen as what the results will be if he is not replaced. Real good pictures can hardly be made unless some one is responsible for the production as a whole, and see that scenic departments, costumes and furnishings harmonize, and as far as possible that each department is in the hands of competent persons. Moving picture making is an art and cannot be satisfactory unless treated as such. I have watched with interest the great progress made by the Edison Company in the past year. Their photography is good, the artistic composition of the picture fine, the furnishings receive greater attention and the acting very superior to what it used to be. Their films are greatly benefited by the use of artistic assistance. What could be finer than their film of "A Summer Girl." Photography, grouping, composition and outdoor backgrounds and even the girl are perfect. The young lady was lovely in both face, figure and manner; we did not get our summer vacation this year, but seeing this film was a recompense. What beautiful effects of open air, sunshine, rivers, etc. The hotel veranda was a delight to the eye. The only thing to cavil at were the two lovers of the girl. They were certainly, neither of them, a suitable match for our charming summer girl, on the whole, however, a very successful film.

Another recent Edison film was evidently carefully thought out. This was the "Surgeon's Temptation." I do not know as to the correctness of the operating room scenes, as when I was last in a place of this kind, I was under the knife, and so could not personally say what it looked like, but it must have been like that. Grouping, acting and composition first rate. Special praise should be given in this picture for the fine effect of light and pictorial composition in the outdoor scene of the breaking of the engagement with the surgeon; clever girl, the heroine in this play, and good looking, too. There are not as many good looking men and women in the pictures as might be possible.

Now as to the picture stage director; he personally gets his action and he trains his people well, and this should be his sole business with the film. We have heard of the director who writes their own scenarios, rushes around town to find suitable actors, costumes and properties, and puts on the whole play himself, he certainly cannot find much time for sleep. Surely he will miss a great many points, and end by working himself out without any great benefit to his employer or himself. These are extreme cases, but it holds in a less or greater degree with all makers. Wanted—A proper system and division of labor. What is the use of sending out your stage director to find locations? He probably would not know a picturesque spot if he saw one, and usually knowing nothing of photography, would certainly not see the possibilities. It requires an artist to select location and compose the elements of the parts into a picture. It ought to be the photographer's duty to attend to this portion of the work and the lighting, but it is sad to say that most moving picture photographers are of the common or garden variety, and they might or might not (sometimes not) be able to turn the handle and make photographs, but would know nothing of making beautiful or characteristic pictures. It is well agreed nowadays that photography is an art, and the camera but a tool like a brush or pencil in the hands of an artist, its field is limited, of course, but so is that of the brush. I consider the camera as the more difficult tool to use properly and to be made to yield its best effects

Another thing often neglected is the common sense of a picture. Mr. Selig, who is doing some good work, gives us a picture "Told in Colorado." It is all right but for one thing, when one of the young men is thrown over the cliff by the jealous rage of the other man, he appears to fall from a great height, and is seen lying practically dead among some very jagged rocks. This part of the picture is worked up for all it is worth, rescuers dangling at the end of a rope through several scenes, giving the impression of a fall of hundreds of feet in wild country, without a shrub or plant of any kind to break the fall, when the young man is brought back to the top he walks away very little hurt, and a glass of whiskey on the hotel veranda completes his cure, "Voila." He was certainly a wonderful young man. A fall like this would surely have killed outright anybody or everybody else in the city of Chicago, and an otherwise good film minimized in value because unnecessarily overdrawn.

Manufacturers would accomplish more by mixing the large amount of money they spend in the making of the negatives with a larger amount of brains, they would certainly get better and more permanent results. Says the manufacturer, "What do I care, I am making the money." They forget that the public are becoming very critical about the pictures and one cannot fool everybody all the time. There have been old firms in other lines of business who have died of dry rot because they would not progress. Certain it is the picture would be more than a passing fad if the folks at the head of the game would do their full duty to themselves and the public. Hear the talk about educational pictures. Where are they? We have not a correct American historical film in the country. We have a number of parts of historic films which are fine, the balance being made up of trivial trash not fit to show children, and even pervert the minds of grown ups.

There is always a demand in every country for patriotic plays or films and there is a fortune for the maker who will do them carefully. Why not, when there is such a demand for scenarios? Cut out your love interest in your colonial pictures and make another film of your loves, sweethearts and kisses, if you think we do not have enough love-making generally in the films. Are you aware that some of the European countries do not understand the indiscriminate kissing drama, and would think it in particularly bad taste when giving the life of a national hero? Their money is well worth having. Certainly a period or historic picture is well worth showing, for its own sake, giving us, as it should, manners, dress and customs of earlier times. It would be quite refreshing to have a film occasionally with the love kisses absent. There is money to be made as an investment in the making of pictures of permanent value and interest. A book publisher will tell you that he does not make his money out of the best sellers of to-day, and which are forgotten to-morrow, but out of the classic works that are always in demand, year in and out, and there is no reason why the same thing should not apply to the moving pictures.

In the latest Rex picture, in the name of common, ordinary inteliigence, why in the theater scenes do we have an empty theater? It always looks as if the leading actor wanted all the fat. It would have given the illusion of reality to have had some spectators; it surely was false economy not to have had three or four extra people in these scenes. Further, Mr. Porter missed his chance for a realistic, lighting effect. Stage box dark, faces lit up by the footlights, stage bright in contrast. We know he could have done it and he would have had a wonderful scene. As it is it is one of the most original arrangements I have seen of a theater stage in the films. Mr. Porter has certainly struck a new and virile way of lighting his films. The scenes on the farm are all fine, especially the composition of the cow and calf and the younger sister. Also a noteworthy moonlight effect in the bedroom when the young lady is packing up to go away. This picture opened fine, but did not develop consistently. The hero falls in love with his stenographer, the heroine, proposes marriage in writing in his business office. She evidently consents. This writing might have been flashed on the screen and would have made the situation clearer. Now a man does not propose to his poor stenographer unless he is really in love with her, yet in the very next scene we see him at the theater throwing bouquets at a dancer, who by the rarest coincidence is the heroine's long lost, much younger sister. Again; when the leading lady finds out the facts of her lover paying attention to another girl, and she discovers it is the runaway younger sister, visits her in the dancer's dressing room, why end the whole thing in a vulgar quarrel? The young sister appears to be a good and clever girl, and would hardly be thrown over completely as this suggests. Another thing, Mr. Rex, when the reconciliation between the lovers takes place in the office, why does the light go out suddenly? They are not married yet in the film, and even if they were it would be in poor taste, to put the light out in a business office whilst two true lovers kiss.

In "The Aggressor," by the Imp Company, we have a fine characterization of the three personages of this little play. Only three actors appear, but they seem to tell the story clearly. There is a fine effective finish; sunset in a valley with water reflection and good sky; it is, however, marred by having the figure of the man too large, altogether too much in the foreground for correct composition. On the same programme we had the same subject by a Chicago firm. A woman leaving her home, and the husband under the impression she has eloped with another man. This latter film was not nearly so well arranged, although it had a lot of cowboys on horseback added. This made the evening's bill appear rather tame.

A Rex story gives us the conventional kiss in a rather new way in silhouette form near a window, but it was too suggestive in the almost complete darkness to have been worth while. We know, of course, that this leading lady and leading man are married in real life, but the public does not. A good picture on the whole, a little lacking in ginger of the right kind, photography poor and out of focus in some of the scenes.

What would we do if we had not the imported pictures as a standard? The French people particularly are great in all arts, and when they do a thing well it is well done indeed. Take a recent Eclair picture "A Just General." What fine acting, particularly in the scene of the general and the old veteran. Although this play is logical, grips you, story simply and clearly told, characters perfect even to the quaint village gossips who greet the young soldier on his return to his native village. The illusion of real life is perfection. The French certainly can do things in art.

What the American manufacturers need most is a good practical working system in the production of photoplays. They should not hesitate to call in outside help, experts in their own line, and put their work on a sure foundation and make the moving picture film a lasting institution. Sir Henry Irving called upon Alma Tadema, one of our greatest modern painters, to design his scenes and costumes. Charles Frohman employed a leading New York artist to assist in his great production of "Joan of Arc." If the film makers did this, they would greatly benefit in speed, economy, and a better quality of product. Mere hard work will no doubt get some of the manufacturers somewhere, but intelligent work is what counts most, and what is required is more brains, and then some more, if the public are not to get tired, before we can give them something reasonable and worth while to look at.

AMICUS.

NEW THEATER FOR SAVANNAH, GA.

One of the finest and most up-to-date picture theaters in the South is the Arcadia Theater, owned and operated by the Savannah Picture Plays Company, of Savannah. It shows the latest pictures and gives good vaudeville acts. The seating capacity of this house is 750, and the cost of construction is estimated at $40,000. It opened for business on October 3rd, and has been enjoying capacity shows since that date. A six-piece orchestra is employed and the admission price is ten cents.

STARLAND THEATER, MONTREAL, CAN.

One of the foremost picture theaters in Montreal, Can., is the Starland, owned by Demetre & Demetelin. The accompanying engraving shows the house dressed for the Coronation of King George V. The orchestra and members of the staff are also in evidence. The Starland has a seating capacity of 750; only first-run pictures are shown and the decorations are very pleasing. The orchestra is under the direction of Prof. A. Rosenburg. The house is under the management of W. H. Tolbutt.

C. B. KLEINE RETIRES.

It is not without feelings of regret that we chronicle the retirement from active business life of Mr. Charles B. Kleine. With his withdrawal from the moving picture field there passes one of its leading lights. In a quiet way, Mr. Kleine has done more to advance the stereopticon and motion picture business in America than the majority of people realize. He is the past-master in the science of optics.

Mr. Kleine was born in Dresden, Germany, in 1838, which brings his age to 73 years at the present time. He came to this country with his parents at the age of thirteen and attended the New York public schools for two years. He was then apprenticed to the old firm of Benjamin Pike's Sons. That firm in its day was considered the leading concern in the manufacture of optical goods in America. There are few perhaps who remember this old and famous concern. With that firm Mr. Kleine learned his trade thoroughly and in every branch. He differs from present day artisans, who, under modern conditions, learn only a part of a trade. But in those days an apprentice boy learned everything about his trade and he had to learn it from the bottom to the top.

After five years of apprenticeship Mr. Kleine worked as a journeyman in the manufacture of optical goods until 1865

when he started in business for himself under his own name. This venture was the making of microscopes, in which he was a very skillful workman, making instruments especially for many of the best biologists of that day.

It was shortly after the Civil War that the old-fashioned oil lamp stereopticon became more or less popular and he found himself dabbling in stereopticon work as a side issue. It remained a side issue until he thought of adapting the calcium light to the oil lamp stereopticon, or what is better known, perhaps, as the "magic lantern." By this process Mr. Kleine revolutionized stereopticon work and opened a great field for lecture work, which has been popular ever since, and elevated it from a home-talent affair into a genuine profession. With the success of the calcium stereopticon, the making of microscopes became the side issue and stereopticon work became the principal part of his business, and it has remained so from that time until now.

With the advent of moving pictures a still wider scope of operation opened to this thorough-going optician and he was one of the first to work out the various problems in optics as applied to present-day film projection. Projection work in moving pictures was in a very crude and unprofessional form until Mr. Kleine came forth with the combination dissolving stereoptikon as applied to the moving picture machine. From that time on, projection work has risen to a much higher plane.

Mr. Kleine is the last of the old school of optical experts who knew the business from every angle. In his time he has made spectacles, microscopes, telescopes, lenses, thermometers, surveying instruments, moving picture machines and various other devices for which a thorough knowledge of optics is required.

The old saying in the Bible about "three-score-and-ten" has done more harm in the world than it ever did good. Through having that phrase dinned into their ears all their lives, thousands of men at seventy have stopped work and considered it their duty to lie down and die. But with his retirement Mr. Kleine assures us that he is just beginning to live. He has been a very busy man throughout his long and useful life and has never taken time to enjoy the idle pleasures of the world. But from this time on he intends to take things easy, going where he likes and doing what suits his fancy. He is known everywhere that optics are spoken of and has so many friends that he will live to be well over one hundred years if he should pay a visit to each one.

The Moving Picture World, while it regrets to see him leave the field, is pleased to have this opportunity to accord him his well-deserved meed of praise with its sincerest best wishes for long life, health and happiness. Mr. Kleine's intentions are to travel through the West, spend the Winter in California and then take a trip abroad. The business will be owned and conducted by his son, Oscar B. Kleine, who will keep up the example set by his father—"a square deal to all." The firm has always been known as C. B. Kleine and as long as it exists the name of C. B. Kleine will never be taken from the door.

PEACE OR WAR—THE CINEMATOGRAPH AN IMPORTANT FACTOR.

In these days of a world-wide agitation for peace, when one thought is dominating the empires of the earth, and one aim and ambition filling the minds of the leading statesmen of every country, it certainly seems strange to raise the question as to the relationship of the cinematograph to the important problem of universal peace.

The aeroplane has made its powers felt to the extent of causing new departments in every war office, and new questions of attack and defense to be studied by the strategists of the world. Increasing the uses and power of the aeroplane, the cinematograph has magnified the opportunities of aerial scouting to the extent of the difference between the casual sight and the perfect and largely explanatory picture.

In warfare, therefore, the cinematograph has now to be considered and reckoned with. Germany and Russia are known to be experimenting with the instrument for the purpose of proving its efficiency in the multitudinous uses to which everyone knows it is adaptable. According to the arguments now accepted as wise, that greater efficiency and preparedness for war has a deterrent effect, and therefore peace is more certainly promoted; it must readily appear that the cinematograph is going to prove an acceptable agent in the cause of peace. If its great aid is going to increase those factors which tell most in the effectual warfare of the future and the influence it thus negatively exercises is making war less desirable, how much greater the influence it positively exercises by presenting it powers as sufficient to be feared, making peace more and more desirable.

It becomes a pleasant duty, therefore, to place on record the fact that the moving picture power is a world-leading agency in the cause of universal peace.

Education and culture mean refinement and peace; this is one of the everyday and everywhere missions of the moving picture; from city to hamlet these influences are felt and acknowledged. That in like manner, but in a larger degree, the nations of the world are experiencing and testifying to these same progressive principles, is indeed an honor and a virtue.

ALBUQUERQUE'S NEW CRYSTAL THEATER.

The New Crystal Theater of Albuquerque, N. M., owned by Joseph Barnett, is said to be one of the finest picture and vaudeville theaters in the Southwest. The building was originally a two-story business block, the second floor was torn out and a balcony built in, giving a large and commodious auditorium seating 1,000 persons. The operating room is equipped with a 1911 Motiograph, Hallberg's economizer and a Mercury Arc Rectifier. Licensed pictures and the best vaudeville that can be secured compose the program.

ANOTHER "TAFT" PICTURE.

Essanay Company "Films" the President at the Ground-Breaking Ceremonies of Panama Exposition at San Francisco.

The Essanay cameras have contributed an excellent topical subject, soon to be released, showing Taft in San Francisco breaking ground for the Panama Exposition to be held in the Western metropolis in 1915. Excellent views of our chief executive will be shown.

The film will also include views of San Francisco, before and after the earthquake, and of the new San Francisco of today. Prominent state and National officials who participated in the ground breaking are also shown.

This is the second big Taft picture which the Essanay have to their credit. Two years ago they issued "Taft in Chicago and at the Ball Game," a novelty which has been recently revived and shown in numerous of the cities Taft has visited in his recent tour.

The release date of the new Taft film has not yet been decided upon, but it is to have an early booking. A review of the film will appear in the next issue of the Moving Picture World.

MISS DOROTHY DAVENPORT.

The above is a perfect likeness of Miss Dorothy Davenport, who, despite her youth, is already well known throughout the moving picture world. She bids fair to outrival her famous aunt, the celebrated Fanny Davenport. Miss Davenport is now leading lady with one of the Nestor companies. Her work needs no recommendation, as it has won her thousands of friends among moving picture audiences throughout the world. She has played leading parts with the Reliance Company, and her splendid work has given charm to each and every picture in which she has appeared. We are glad to see that the Nestor people are sparing neither money nor pains to give the exhibitor the best pictures that can be produced. Mr. Horsley has left for Los Angeles to select sites for the Nestor companies for their winter's work.

Dr. J. B. McFetrich, president of the board of education of Chicago, stated when interviewed that no invention of the age can be used to greater advantage than motion pictures in general educational work.

AMONG THE CHICAGO SHOWS.

The Banner Theater, at Milwaukee Avenue and Robey Street, is a good example of the house of large seating capacity, which has been successful with a program of straight pictures. It seats 800, yet it is a common thing to see people in a double line for half a block or more from its doors. The sign over the door, "We don't cheat the people," indicates the policy of the house, and the show within is excellent. The program consists of three reels of licensed film, with a spot song or solo to fill in the intermission to change films. Projection is excellent, the pictures being very steady and well lighted for their size, about 18 feet, considering that alternating current is used. There is a slight rock, due to the vibration of the machine; a motiograph is used, and it seems that the bearing surface of the top of the "Gibraltar pedestal" is not large enough to hold the base board of the machine quite steady. Otherwise the picture on the curtain is very pleasing. The effects in this house are very well handled indeed, and the drummer somewhat surprised me in one scene in the Selig, "The Rival Stage Lines," by actually giving the clink of the harness while it was changed at the relay. This is good work, and shows study; the other effects were above the average, too. Manager E. F. Clipson showed the "Two Orphans" recently, and despite the large seating capacity of the Banner, nearly 1,500 people were turned away. The show closed at 11:30 p. m. that evening. The success of the Banner only indicates that it delivers the goods in the essentials and details of good moving picture house management; good films, well projected, accompanied by appropriate music and correct sound effects, and supplemented by high-class songs and music.

The Willard Theater.

The Willard Theater, at 51st Street and Calumet Avenue, celebrated its anniversary last week. This is one of the high-class vaudeville houses of the type now becoming popular, giving two shows an evening of good vaudeville and motion pictures, at an admission price of ten and twenty cents. The vaudeville on the evening I was there seemed to me to be of unusually high quality, and every act got an encore. One of them, a musical novelty, used a motion picture with telling effect. The film was one of Pathe's hand colored fireworks pictures, "Cascades of Fire," and when thrown on the instrument produced a very pretty effect indeed. The motion picture offered at the end of the show was a Pathe comedy, and was very well projected. I noticed that a Sunlight screen had been placed in front of the old white curtain, being flied like the others, only, of course, being handled more slowly and carefully on account of its weight. After the show I went up to the operating room and got acquainted with the operator, Charles W. Ryder, whom I found to be a very fine fellow. He showed me his Kinodrome machine, which though not bulky or very heavy looking, is very substantial and capable of putting up a very good performance, and its lamp, with its provision for moving the upper carbon about the lower—a necessity with alternating current—and incidentally as nicely formed a crater as I have seen with alternating current, 60 amperes through a transformer being used.

The Paragon Theater.

The Paragon Theater, just off 51st Street on Prairie Avenue, has a good picture, but I would suggest to the manager that he light up his house a little. To one coming in from the well-lighted streets outside it is impossible to to distinguish empty seats from occupied ones, and it isn't pleasant to have one's toes trampled upon by incomers taking a seat near one. The house could be lighted effectively without injuring the picture, and in a refined neighborhood such as this the light house is a point in any theater's favor.

The Forum Theater.

The Forum Theater, on East 55th Street, near Washington Park, is a popular house, as Manager Gelder has found it necessary to post in the lobby a sign reading "Hold your own ticket. Do not crowd." This last seems to be superfluous advice, as the show inside is of such good quality that they crowd anyway. I saw an Edison here, "No Cooking Allowed," an excellent home-like little subject that brought smiles to the faces of everybody, especially at its ending, which is not at all weak. It's the same old story here, too, where there is a successful house—good films and excellent projection.

A racehorse named Moving Picture was entered at the Westchester (N. Y.) County Fair. We are not speculative, but we might have laid a fiver by way of moral support had we known of it.

Projection Department

Edited by F. H. RICHARDSON.

Interesting Letter.—Mr. Chas. Storch, owner and manager Casino Theater, Republic, Wash., writes: "Have enjoyed the Department so much since I have been in the business as my own manager and operator. Think it's about time I let loose what I have learned since relinquishing the occupation of prospector for gold for that of the prospector for nickels and dimes, and good projection. Bought the theater here in February, 1910. Since then have purchased the building, put in 300 best opera chairs, tungsten lights inside and out, transformers, fans and three rheostats for emergency, hooked up so they may be used singly or all together. Changed wiring from No. 10 to No. 2 and 6, making my own connections. Drilled holes in my carbon arms and swagged in No. 2 wires, having them extend outside the lamphouse. Haven't had a lamp lead burn off in nine months. Go over all connections with emery paper three times a week, thus keeping them bright and in good electrical condition. Put an attachment on machine gate to eliminate all up and down movement on screen. Am now working on scheme to eliminate side motion as well. Am confident of success. Have asked no questions of any one, but many a night have stayed hours after the show was over studying things, when something truned up which I did not understand. I never let up until I had discovered where the trouble lay and applied a remedy. Have read much about condenser breakage trouble. Have no such thing here. My back condenser looks like a pepper-box lid, but I get good light. Therefore it remains. Tried a new one, of which I keep six on hand for emergency, but the old one gave better results; so put it back. I rack lamp clear back, cut in all the resistance of the three rheostats and let the arc simmer for nearly an hour before starting the first show. Have never broken a lens. Can do as above and then cut all three 30 ampere rheostats in multiple, on fourth contact, and never a crack in a lens. This procedure has solved the problem for me—before I even knew there was a condenser breakage problem. It may help some one else. I set my carbons by measurement and have the arc before me all the time, without any attachment on lamphouse to project or reflect it. Wonder how many operators have caught on to this simple thing?"

Probably you have merely punched a very small hole somewhere in the condenser casing or wall of lamphouse, or bent a condenser mount vent hole to let light through; all old, well known things. I have read your letter with much interest. It very evidently comes from a hustler—a live wire. I cannot allow you to get us mixed up on that "inversion" matter just now. It has been thrashed over in the department pretty thoroughly and we are too hard up for space just now to take it up again. Later—maybe. Your scheme for warming up the lens solves one end of the problem. However, it does not help the man who is compelled to jerk open the door of his lamphouse and adjust carbons almost the instant the arc is cut off, having but one to one and a half minutes to change reels, put in new carbons, etc., between shows, using one machine. Also very few are equipped with three rheostats hooked up to use either in series or multiple. Also your scheme would use up too much current when operating on meter service. Probably you pay flat rate. We would very much like to have description of the device for eliminating up and down motion. If you can overcome the effect of bad perforation you certainly are going some. But you will have to show me, brother Stroch. But, nevertheless, your letter is of much interest and you have certainly installed a very excellent equipment. If you use No. 2 solid lamp leads I take it you have whole back of lamphouse out. That "pepper-box" lens absorbs a lot of light. That means more current to get result; hence loss.

All Too Common Occurrence.—Mr. J. T. May, Canadian, Tex., writes, saying that the U. S. Amusement Company, a film exchange of Amarillo, Tex., agreed to furnish 18 reels per week to his house, none of which should average over 30 days and none be commercial. Says he has had three reels 40 to 60 days old and rest in bad shape—junk. Price, $30. Refused to pay, claiming that service was not as agreed. Exchange threatens suit and to warn other exchanges to "look out for" Mr. May.

This opens up a question which needs airing very badly. The whole trouble lies in the fact that business methods are not followed in buying and selling service. I was at one time manager of an exchange in Memphis, Tenn., doing a weekly business in excess of $1,500. You say that it was agreed that 18 reels average 30 days and none be "commercial." That "averaging" leaves much room for argument. For instance: If they furnished you reels for three weeks all much older than 30 days and then for three weeks kept away under the 30 the average would be there. As to the "commercial"—well, will some one kindly tell me what the term means anyhow? As a matter of fact it is a joke. Probably no two men would define it exactly alike. Friend May, you should have known that no exchange could possibly furnish you 18 reels per week of decent stock for thirty dollars. The thing cannot be done. The exchange probably did as too many exchanges do, made a loose, largely meaningless verbal agreement and handed you the bundle of junk the price calls for. That is the way it looks. They can most likely collect their bill, as you can't prove they would not have "averaged" on the 18 reels, and "commercial" is a term that means nothing at all. If exhibitors buy service thus loosely they must expect to get stung. The only proper way is to have a written agreement, that so many of the reels shall not exceed so many days from date of release and so on until the whole service is covered. Have this in writing, with clause reading that reels not conforming to agreement, unless sent by consent of the exhibitor in writing, shall be paid for at half rate, or not at all. Probably exchanges would kick like a steer at such an agreement, maybe refusing to make it. However, some such business-like arrangement is sadly needed, as I have long since pointed out. You will find this matter fully set forth on page 165 of the Handbook. According to my own experiences there is a considerable amount of truth in the Amarillo exchange's statement that exchanges need look for no gratitude from exhibitors. Let an exchange treat a customer fairly, and more than fairly, keeping every promise and the very first time the agent of an opposition exchange comes along promising (promises in the film business are made to be broken) a little more or a little less price, and Mr. Exhibitor, forgetting the square treatment he has had, can't get to the telegraph office quick enough to order the service stopped. Probably the new outfit stings him good and plenty. He then complains, of course, but he really got just what was coming to him. My advice is, Canadian, pay the bill and buy service along sane, businesslike lines hereafter. Glad to have that shutter pattern.

Excellent.—Washington, D. C., writes, paying his compliments to the "Chicago Chump," in pretty hot lines. He says: "The average beginner or low class operator imagines there is really no knowledge required to run a moving picture machine. Just turn the crank—that's all—and wait for the pay envelope. That is where the trouble lies. The fact is it requires much knowledge to even turn the crank properly. I am forwarding you under separate cover a few photographs of the leading moving picture theater in Washington. I have seen photographs of operating rooms in your columns, but I have yet to see one equal to ours. The room is 28 feet long, 8 feet wide and 9 feet high. We have two No. 6 Powers machines, a Fort Wayne motor-generator set and an electric re-winder. The proprietors, Messrs. Miller Brothers, have not overlooked the smallest detail to make the work pleasant for the operators, even supplying a washstand with running water and a cabinet, with clean towels every day. You can readily see why I am proud of my operating room. The machines we have I consider the best in existence. As for the motor generator, it is a blessing to the operator who knows how to take care of it. Not only that, but it saves two-thirds on the electric light bill and gives a clear steady light. It consumes about 12 amperes, 220 volts at the motor side, and generates 35 to 40 amperes, 50 volts, D. C. Both machines are in alternate operation and by that we do away with the annoying intermission. The house opens at 10:30 A. M. and employs three operators. The writer, seen in one of the photographs, is chief operator, ably assisted by Mr. Wm. Chaney and Mr. Thomas F. Bruce.

The attendants are attired in full dress suits, and a ladies' maid is also employed. But above all, I wish to mention that we enjoy the best patronage in the District of Columbia with both afternoons and evenings played to capacity. The house is the most beautiful in the city and every courtesy is extended to the patrons. Good, sound intelligent business principles have been applied to the Leader Theater by Messrs. Miller Brothers, who have made the Leader Theater the leader not only in name, but in reality. I will write you at a later date about the city in general and especially will mention the motor generator or compensor, since you have had several disputes on this subject. I can at any time burn an arc without any resistance if I desire."

Your room certainly looks good, Washington. That vent-pipe evidently isn't a little dinky ten-inch imitation. The wash bowl will give most operators heart failure. I'll have to call you down on one thing, though. That wall shutter seems to be tied up. Those shutters ought to be held by a line passing directly over the aperture and not more than one foot from it. Otherwise no criticism. Glad to have the article mentioned, at your convenience.

Motor Drive.—Our old friend, Homer, Ill., writes, saying he noticed request for description of methods of attaching motors for driving machines and that apparently very few responded. Says he recently installed a Kimble variable speed motor and that it works splendidly. He is able to govern speed as well as though running by hand. Has had very busy season, but "always took time to read the Moving Picture World, advertisements and all, and that was how he came to buy a Kimble motor. Sometimes the Publicity Man does tell the truth and he thinks this is one of the times." He further says he has successfully attached outside shutter to Edison machine, the shutter moving and the lens remaining stationary. It works well.

Glad to hear from you, Homer. I apologize about the shutter. I've been liberally snowed under with motor drives. I'm seeing them in my dreams. Have already given space to some that seemed best. That dollar will be applied as you request. Had forgotten all about it.

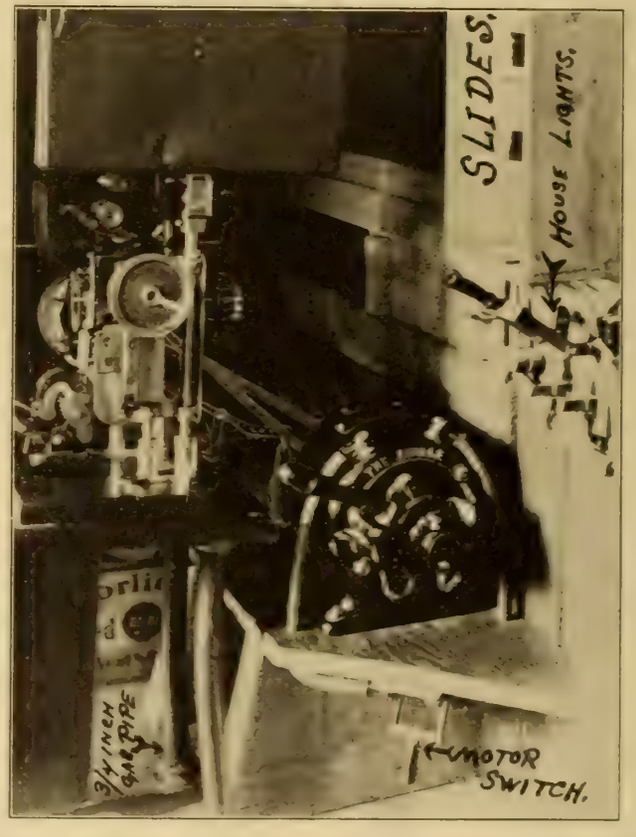
Film Bubbles.—East Bakersfield, Cal., writes, saying he has received much benefit from the Department. He has had trouble, of late, with his Edison Type B. The film usually runs through O K, but sometimes it will buckle under the lower sprocket roller and run off to one side. Can't find anything wrong with machine and sprockets seem to be in line. Another operator in same city has same trouble. They believe it is the fault of the film.

You would have done well to have told me something of the condition of the films you use. Perhaps it is junk and full of bad patches, broken sprocket holes, etc. However, see to it that your lower idler bracket is held firmly in place by its spring and that your takeup is not pulling too hard. For the rest would suggest that the films be carefully looked over and all bad patches re-cemented or cut out. True that takes time and labor, but it pays in the end.

Double Drive.—The Kimble Electric Company writes describing a motor connection built by them for a theater in Sharon, Pa., designed to drive two machines with one motor. The manager of the theater in which it was installed, Mr. Wesley Edwards, speaks enthusiastically of the device, and of the motor also. Briefly the plant consists of the following: One 1/16 h. p. Kimble, variable speed A C 110 V motor mounted on a base, on which is also mounted a double countershaft, each alike, but running independently of each other. Six inch grooved pulleys, supplied with the outfit, are mounted on crank shaft of the machines. The countershafts carry two 15 inch crown face pulleys in exact alignment, running side by side and close together. On each of the countershafts is also a 2-inch pulley. The motor has a wide faced, flat pulley. From this pulley a belt runs to the crown pulley of one of the countershafts and from the two inch countershaft pulleys (grooved) a round belt runs to machine pulley. To change from one machine to the other it is not necessary to touch the motor. By a lever the belt is shifted from one crown faced pulley to the other. The variable speed motor allows perfect regulation of speed to fit the action of the film. Mr. Edwards says the outfit works perfectly.

We are obliged to Mr. Edwards and the Kimble people for the description of the plant. It will no doubt be of great value to those having two machines and wishing to run both with motor power.

More Motor.—Mr. E. M. Hammond, Porterville, Cal., writes: "Am using Powers Five, A C 110 V., 60 cycle. Eighteen ft. picture at 64 feet. Have a Kimble ⅛ h. p. motor. Its installation was my first step towards artistic projection, as the variable speed lever gives me entire control and can tone speed to fit any scene to perfection. It leaves both hands free too, which is some item, let me tell you. Attached photo is self-explanatory as to method of attaching motor. There is nothing like a Kimble, to my way of thinking. Have used the motor eight months and haven't touched it with any tool except the oil can. I hope this will benefit someone, as I have been benefitted through the Department. Think the Handbook is great, especially on carbon setting."



The arrangement shown in photo is excellent. But what is it you have on machine crank shaft? Your machine table looks good and solid. The slide rack is fine.

Advertising.—New York City asks if it would not be a paying proposition to travel, giving open air exhibitions of motion pictures, interspersed with advertising slides; the advertising to produce the revenue:

I would strongly advise New York City to acquire a healthy bankroll before he starts on that particular stunt. He'll probably need it before he gets back. It is one of those things which look alluring to the uninitiated. Those who have "ridden the goat" wouldn't touch it with a ten-foot pole. In the first place New York would very soon discover that merchants wouldn't be sending him telegrams to save space for their ads. In fact he would probably need a crowbar to pry the ads away. Then, too, he would find that where he, being inexperienced (he wouldn't have asked the question if he was experienced) figures one dollar expense it would really take nearer five. The local papers would knock you. The local showman would inspire the local authorities to make things unpleasant for you in the way of license holdups, etc. Bad weather would smite you. Breakdowns and delays would conspire to make life miserable for you. Railways would lose your stuff and break what they couldn't manage to lose. Verily, your joys would consist mainly of anticipating the day of your return, a chastened, sadder and wiser man—oh yes, and a poorer one too. Better buck the ponies, New York, and go broke decently and in order.

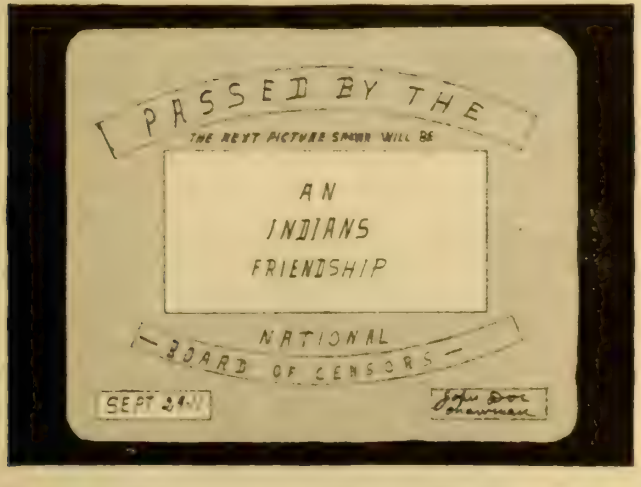
Valuable Idea.—Recently Mr. Armstrong, chairman Ontario Board of Censors, consulted the editor as to some better scheme for affixing the Board's seal of approval to films. His idea was a perforator to cut the stamp into five feet of film. After talking the matter over I took him to Mr. Nicholas Power, who considered the matter and evolved the following scheme:



The idea is to make an artistic drawing like the shaded portion of the slide; this to be permanent. The title portion and date is cut out of the drawing. The date and title is then printed on a separate card and the whole photographed. As many slides are then made as will be necessary for that film, one slide to go with each film sent out by the exchange. Slide must be exhibited on the screen before showing the film. With the slide goes a printed license card, on which is name of film and serial number. This seems a cheap, effective method. Counterfeiting it would be punishable by law. The license cards could be exhibited in the ticket office windows, informing the patron of the bill for the day.

Unsigned Letters.—From Atlanta, Ga., have come unsigned letters. I have repeatedly notified correspondents that letters, to receive consideration, must be signed. Names need not be published, but we must know who the writer is. Probably this writer thinks I am aware of his identity. Maybe I ought to know, but I don't.

Union Wanted.—Live Oak, Fla., wants to know if there is any operators' union in Florida. If not what is nearest one. There is an I. A. T. S. E. local in Pensacola, Henry Blake, 911 N. 8th Avenue, Secretary. Write Ralph J. Bailey, P. O. box 759, New Orleans, La., Sec. Operators' Union No. 1. Probably he can furnish desired information.

Motor Generator.—Cripple Creek, Colo., writes: "I have been reading the Moving Picture World for several years and think it is just the paper that all the operators should have. We have installed, in the Majestic Theater where I am employed, a motor generator set. The generator gives us 115 volts and seventy-two amperes. You know that our friend Mr. Gundy, of Leadville, said that he ran his arc without a resistance. I uphold his statement for the reason that I have run my machine without resistance since the installment of the plant. This is my method: The dynamo is a compound wound. By shunting two of the fields I can control the amount of amperage by my field rheostat on my switchboard. If this letter does not explain fully my method, I can make a drawing and send you the same upon request.

"I wish to say that before this set was installed, we were using thirty cycle, 110 volts, and about forty-five amperes and had a fair picture. Our competitors installed D. C. current and this compelled us to do the same. Of course, it is needless to say that the picture was more as bright as it could be with the machine and shutter that I use. The latter I constructed myself. I am sure that the picture shown at this house stands second to no other projection in the state of Colorado. I have one of your hand-books which I received from the Bio Carbon Company. I am a member of the I. A. of T. S. E. Local No. 52, and also a member of L. B. E. W. Local No. 70."

Glad to know you excel in projection. Will be pleased to have sketch mentioned. Aren't you in error in saying your generator is a 115 V. machine? If it is I would certainly like to know just how you reduce voltage to 50 at the arc.

No Trouble.—Mr. H. S. Klink, Canton, Ohio, writes: "Note operators having trouble with loop-losing, Edison machine. Have also noticed each one has different remedy. Have run Edison machines past seven years and have no trouble at all. Only thing I do is look over my films carefully before using. (Very important precaution indeed, Neighbor Klink—Ed.). Have worked for one man six years. He doesn't stand for any unnecessary stops. Referring to letter from Lima, Ohio, Oct. 14 issue: I don't believe tumbling shaft shutter connection is good. A little wear will produce lots of lost motion. Moreover when such a connection is used the shutter must slide in and out as framing carriage moves. When carriage is central, shutter must be about 1½ inches from lens. Results won't be very good. You say shutter won't work if it frames up and down in relation to lens. I think you must be wrong in this."

I did not take into account the increased speed as the shutter drops—that is to say, while the light ray is cut at wider part of blade when shutter is clear down it really amounts to the same blade width in practical effect, since nearer the periphery of the blade speed is greater. Therefore, while I would not say positively without studying the matter, which I lack time to do now, the effect is the same regardless of position of shutter.

Various Things.—Chicago, Ill., writes: "Have received much benefit from the department. Hand you herewith sketch of tilting attachment I have made for my lamp. Would like your opinion of same. Have used various lamps with arrangement for tilting carbon, but none of them are practical. Is a lamp made with really practical device for tilting top carbon? Could I have a blacksmith make such an attachment? I set carbons with bottom one angled out somewhat from line of rackbars and top one to match. Get pure, white light and no ghost. Candle power is not quite so great as when I angle them more, but this set gives excellent results. The chorus slide of almost every set of song slides we get is cracked. Here is how I have stopped cracking chorus slides from heat: I anneal a cover glass in the regular way and drop it in between the slide and arc. With the annealed glass in place I can leave a chorus slide in long enough to sing it four or five times without fear of its cracking. I also use an annealed glass between condensers and arc. It not only protects them to some extent from breakage but also from being pitted by hot particles of carbon. I find that when I turn my lens-tube the picture moves on the screen quite a distance, but remains in focus at all points. Is a Bell & Howell transformer as good as other makes? The transformer does not get hot, but the carbons make lots of noise. Recently one of the operators who hang around the exchanges here said to me (had just been fired), "Well, I fixed 'em when I quit. I put water in the oil, greased the condensers and reversed the lenses." What ought to be done with such poor simple-minded dubs? If ever you visit Chicago, don't fail to come and see me."

Within a few weeks the Powers Company will put out a new lamp with an attachment for tilting the top carbon, which is entirely practical. You could have a blacksmith make such an attachment, certainly. It might not work very well, however. The adjustment is one I have repeatedly called attention to—to its importance, I mean—in the department. It is absolutely necessary to the best results with A. C. and a great convenience with D. C., provided it be made so that it is really practical. Your carbon set is all right, though I personally prefer same set for A. C. and D. C. You speak as though annealing glass were easy. Please tell us how you do it. As I understand it, glass must be heated redhot and the temperature be gradually dropped to coldness through a period covering several days to anneal it. By what process do you accomplish the result? Such "poor, simple-minded dubs" should be kicked out of the business. Movement of picture as you revolve lens is due to center of front and back combination not being in same relation to tube. Cheap lenses are often that way. The Kosmic (B. & H.) transformer is an excellent device, though my own experience is that it does create considerable carbon vibration.

Pictures.—Longe Beach, Calif., sends in some interesting pictures of his arc. He also sends one of theater front, but has printed it backward, therefore we cannot publish it. Calls attention to article in The Player, official organ of White Rats of A. Comments on that publication, giving M. P. matters some space and then, at every opportunity handing moving pictures a "bunch."

Well, my dear boy, what do you expect from an actor's paper? The Player is not the only theatrical publication forced to take cognizance of motion picture affairs and to pretend to cater to them. The "catering" is usually done with a carefully concealed bludgeon ready for use at every opportunity. The theatrical publications love motion pictures, and everything connected therewith just like his Satanic Majesty is supposed to love Holy Water. However, I note that your own theater gives the pictures a worse knock than does the player. All vaudeville acts are set forth in detail, but the pictures are simply referred to as "G, Pantagescope;" A B C, etc., being vaudeville stunts. By inference, the name of the house being Pantage's Theater, we form the idea that "Pantagescope" translated means motion picture machine and that a film, or films are run under section G.

Light Trouble.—Schaghticoke, N. Y., says he has a dark ghost or streak, diagonally in center of his 12 ft. picture. Uses 110 v., 40 cycle current, through rheostat. Does not give amperage. Has tried moving lamphouse and moving lamp in lamphouse. Light seems yellowish. Had lot of trouble with picture jumping. Remedied it by use of information received through the Department. Still has a trouble he cannot account for. Picture will get out of focus for a few seconds and then come all right again. Has an Edison two-pin machine.

The fact that you have 40 cycle current makes good light somewhat difficult to obtain. I believe that in all probability the greater part of your trouble, so far as light is concerned, arises from too little amperage. But you have not told me what your rheostat delivers, therefore I can only guess at it. Try one 6½ and one 7½ condensing lens. If not satisfactory, try two 7½ lenses. With 40 cycle current I believe you ought to use at least fifty amperes on a 12 foot picture. As to the out and in focus effect, it is caused by the film buckling as it passes over the aperture. The most prolific cause of this is worn aperture plate tracks. Loose tension springs shifting from side to side will also cause it. Very dry film will often buckle in spite of all one can do, even though springs and tracks be perfect. The film must be and remain perfectly flat as it passes over aperture. If it buckles (bulges in or out) its distance from the lens is altered in its center. As much, or little, as 1/64 of an inch variation of distance of film from lens will ruin the focus. That two-pin mechanism is out of date. Too much flicker and too much loss of light.

Is Patented.—Mr. S. Jacobson, of the Jacobson Arc Controller Company, St. Louis, Mo., calls our attention to the fact that the arc projector described and illustrated on p. 127, Oct. 14 issue, is covered by basic patents owned by that company. The projector will be marketed within a couple of weeks. We are obliged to Mr. Jacobson for calling our attention to the matter.

Transparent Screen.—Philmont, N. Y., asks if it is possible to project through the screen, and, if so, what kind of screen is best.

Yes, Philmont, it can be and is done. You can use a thin lawn, stretched tight, sized and coated with white shellac. The Mirror screen manufacturers make a screen for this kind of work, but it is glass and somewhat expensive. It gives high-class results, however. Would be glad to hear from those who have information of value on this subject.

Rectifier.—Trinidad, Colo., writes, asking information concerning Mercury Arc Rectifier. Says he has just installed one and it works fine. Wants to know how long the bulb will last and if it will stand the cold if placed outside.

We refer you to p. 206, Oct. 21 issue. The bulbs last varying lengths of time. Know of them running more than a year. I would not like to chance cold winds blowing directly on the rectifier, but it could be inclosed in a glass case. I've spent some pleasant days in your city. Used to go there quite frequently.

Problem.—Norfolk suggests that the matter of operating without rheostat in series with arc be put up to operators in general, allowing them to study the matter and figure out just how it is done. The problem is: A claims it is possible to produce an arc suitable for projection purposes, which may be regulated so as to use anywhere from 25 to 75 amperes at the arc, arc voltage (D C.) 45 to 50, without rheostat in circuit between generator and arc lamp. Let us hear your explanation of just how this may be accomplished.

KLIEGL BROTHERS' NEW HOME.

Kliegl Brothers, the well-known manufacturers of "everything electrical" for the theatrical stage and moving picture studio, having outgrown their old quarters at 1393 Broadway, have leased the entire building numbered 238-240 West Fiftieth Street, in which they have installed apparatus and accommodations to further perfect their "flood light" system for moving picture studios.

The Kliegl Flood Light System is now being used in several of the largest moving picture studios throughout the country, and is endorsed by the most critical stage managers and directors as being the best light for this class of work.

HALLBERG'S CATALOGUE OUT.

The Moving Picture World is in receipt of a copy of Hallberg's catalogue; it consists of 96 pages and cover, filled to the very last page with the kind of information the exhibitor wants to have. Aside from being a typographical work of art, it is the most comprehensive picture trade catalogue that has been published by anyone up to this writing. About every known device of value suited to the requirements of the exhibitor is listed between its covers. Mr. Hallberg asks 25 cents for this work of art and it is worth the money.

AMUSEMENT COMPANY REORGANIZED.

A concern in Portland, Ore., formerly known as the Brooklyn Amusement Company, has been reorganized and is now incorporated under the title of Northwest Amusement Company, with a capital of $25,000. The officers of the new company are W. S. Wessling, president; B. J. Sperry, vice-president, and H. W. Turrell, secretary and treasurer. A number of new houses under construction will be added to the Northwest Company's circuit.

The Song and the Singer

By CLARENCE E. SINN.

WHEN a publisher concentrates his efforts upon one particular song it is because he believes that particular number contains the elements that go to make a hit. He doesn't, as a general rule, form this opinion in any haphazard fashion either; the music publishing business is in the hands of shrewd business men who apply the same principles to this they would to any other line. Time was when the main difference between publishing songs and shaking dice was that you could lose more money by the former way, but in these strenuous times little is left to "luck." Chances are balanced with a fair degree of accuracy when it is remembered that the final issue rests in a large measure upon the whim of a fickle public.

The promoting or "boosting" of a popular song would make an interesting story of itself, but not more so than would the stories of the men behind the songs. Will Rossiter, the Chicago publisher, is one of these and his song, "I'd Love To Live In Loveland With a Girl Like You," is a case in point. This song was introduced quietly without fuss or boosting; just left to float along with a lot of others to see what it could do for itself. Up to date the sales have reached over two hundred thousand copies, which Will Rossiter thinks is a remarkably good showing, considering the fact that little or nothing has been spent in promoting or advertising the song. Now he is going to push it for fair, and he is some pusher when he feels pushy. Frank Gage, who has charge of the slide department, tells me that in one week they shipped five hundred sets of slides for "I'd Love To Live In Loveland With a Girl Like You." That is a lot of slides in one week, if you stop to think about it. At five dollars a set this would represent $2,500. Will Rossiter says they are going to make this one of the greatest ballad hits of the year. He says "they" are because he concedes that the singer has considerable to do in the making of a song, and he has some good ones on his staff. Here is the roster: John Baxter (the man behind the voice); Ethel Barney (the little girl with the boy's voice); Bess Stokes (the girl with the voice and smile); Joe Marshall (the high man with the low voice); Ted Ullmark (singing the songs you like); Andy Mylotte (with a voice you can hear); and Bob Daily (the happy singer).

Ted Snyder's coming hit is "One O'Clock In the Morning I Get Lonesome." He has other hits in stock, don't forget to remember. One of them is "Mysterious Rag." I heard Tom Hanlon and Lew Butler (both on the Ted Snyder forces) do this song last week. Believe me, they do good work. Clark and Bergman, at the Majestic, are a riot with "Alexander's Band" and "Mysterious Rag." Miss Flo Jacobson, at the Coliseum last week, during the Congressional meet; this week at the Crown Theater. Also singing at the States restaurant and putting over a line of Ted Snyder's songs. She says that "The Mysterious Rag" promises to be one of the biggest hits Ted Snyder has ever put over. The business is still on the increase. The retail store is doing enough to warrant them in devoting the entire floor to this department alone, while the professional department in spite of the screen piano rooms now in use is not sufficient to meet the demands. Ted Snyder will have to put in a couple of bay windows or something pretty soon if he don't want to spill out all over the sidewalk.

Rocco Vocco, who is professional manager for Chas. K. Harris in Chicago, writes: "We are not pushing any one particularly in advance of another. They are all good and all making good, which is the supreme test. Sales are big and the season looks very promising. As to news items these may interest you." And he gave me the following: Hale O'Reilly is at the Circle Theater singing "Don't Blame Me For Loving You," "Don't You Mind It, Honey," and "Mississippi Splash." Phil Farnum is a tremendous hit at the Alcazar with "Joe, You're Good-a-For-Not" and "Mississippi Splash." Fuller Minstrels on the Sullivan-Considine time are going big with "Bless Your Lovin' Heart." The Ellis Ten Musical Hawaiians open the big land show at Philadelphia, starting October 9, and are using with great success "Bless Your Lovin' Heart" and "Don't Blame Me For Loving You." Rocco Vocco, at the Garfield Theater singing Chas. K. Harris successes. Edna Shephard, at the Jefferson, and Johnnie Keanan, at the Pastime Theater, are also using songs from the Harris catalog. Carmen Romano ,at the Casino Theater, is singing "Don't Blame Me For Loving You" to big applause every performance. Goldie Wilson is another excellent singer who is making good with Chas. K. Harris songs. The Tivoli Quartette, now playing the Orpheum time, are using "Bless Your Lovin' Heart" and report best results.

O. B. Stimpson, manager of the States Restaurant, is going to be a very busy man this season. Not but what he is usually that kind of a man, but he will probably be in line to give a few tips on the original Bizzy Izzy before the flowers bloom in the spring-tra-la. He has taken charge of the "States Four" (male quartette) consisting of Sid Lachman, first tenor; Chas. E. Hay, second tenor; Billie Loos, first bass and Ernie Loos, second bass. Ernie Loos is the man with the elastic voice—was singing tenor last week and now doing the basso end. The "States Four" are singing the Remick hits (being all on the Jerome H. Remick staff of boosters) and are pulling off a stunt that redounds to the credit of all concerned. They are singing at the Cort Theater between the second and third acts every night this week—the other attraction at this house being Thos. Ross in "An Every Day Man." They are also engaged at the same theater for next week at the opening of "He Fell In Love With His Wife." This is some boost for the Remick songs.

Prideaux and Malchom are putting over "My Lovin' Honey Man" and "Killarney, My Home O'er the Sea," both from the catalog of Leo Feist. Prideaux (late of the team Prideaux and Howard) says these two songs are all the candy, and are going as well as any in the market. He also informed me in a whisper (stage whisper) that Leo Feist has a couple of new ones almost ready to spring on the glad public, which are really and truly "hum-dingers." (I don't know what a hum-dinger is, but it must be something good). Prideaux and Malchom are at the Orchard Theater week of the 9th and the Pastime week following.

Comments on the Films

"An Old Sweetheart of Mine" (Edison), October 17.—The object of this picture is to tell a love story of a boy and girl as memory brings back the scenes out of long ago to a middle aged man of family. Mark McDermott plays the dreamer, and as he sits before his blazing logs he sees these pretty dream-pictures as framed in his fireplace. The youth and his sweetheart are shown growing up together from childhood. Instead of singing with slides, the man is merely dreaming with motion picture slides. The man's wife comes in and interrupts his dreaming. This last scene is really much more effective than the dream pictures, fine as they are. The audience applauded it and seemed to like it very much.

"A Fairyland of Frost and Snow" (Gaumont), October 17.—The camera man was out early after a heavy fall of soft snow and caught some exquisite pictures of feathery dells, farm houses and country ways under deep, soft white. It makes a very pretty film.

"Done Brown" (Gaumont), October 17.—The young husband's liking for the club didn't please his wife. There was to be a masquerade ball to which he was going and the wife put on a mask and, as an unknown fair one, she got her husband so much interested that he let her blindfold his eyes and take him home to a "cold bottle and hot bird." She led him into his own dining room and there took off the blind. He surely was done brown. This situation has been pictured before. There is, however, a piquancy in the work of the leading lady of the picture that gives it a good deal of charm. The scenes are very well tinted. The audience was interested and watched it closely.

"Git a Hoss" (Lubin), October 19.—An old story—"Alkali Ike's Auto"—retold in the same way, but not so funny as the former. There is very little that is fresh in this picture. It is the story of a cowboy who bought a motor car, and a girl who jilted another man to go riding with him. The other man follows in his wagon. After the motor car has cut up many high jinks and finally come to rest, he overtakes it and the girl continues her outing in the wagon. It took a weary long while to get started, and even at its best was not very amusing. There was one man who laughed several times, and several who laughed once or twice. At the end, there was a spark that made a ripple of amusement. The show was just getting under way when this film was shown, yet three people left while it was playing.

"The Renegade Brother" (Pathe), October 19.—A Californian-Mexican picture. The renegade is Tony, the younger and favorite son of the rich Don Louis. He is shown as both weak and vicious and the father sternly casts him off; but this transition in the picture is very abrupt. It is hard to make such a change wholly convincing in any form of art, and yet producers often content themselves with showing conditions before and after the change, leaving to the spectators' imagination the labor of filling the gap. This usually makes the picture seem crude. Tony, when he is cast off, induces the elder brother's fiancée to run away with him. He had already been shown as subtilly working to supplant his brother in her affections and she is an easy victim. Years pass; the elder brother is now a priest. He encounters his brother's wife with her little girl, recognizes her and finds that she is in distress, for Tony has gone the downward path to the very depths; he is a thief. Later, the older brother protects him and, as it is shown, induces him to lead a better life. It is well acted and interesting, but expresses clearly no important idea, and it is not very dramatic.

"Their Tiny Babies" (Essanay), October 19.—A fantastic picture of topsy-turvydom. Two little dwarfs have two children, a boy and a girl, of about seven and five years respectively. But these children are giants, bigger than the peanut man who sells them sweets. They pick up their parents and carry them. The audience chuckled a little at the situation, but one feels that it should have been a "scream." The Essanay Company's big players were a bit too heavy in their playing to make it wholly funny.

"'Tis Better to Have Loved and Lost" (Essanay), October 19.—This, on the same reel with "Their Tiny Babies," is a light burlesque and deals with a girl who had three lovers. The accepted one, a few years later, is seen by the others scrubbing. It is mildly amusing throughout, but not very funny in any one part. Perhaps it comes too close to satire to be thoroughly enjoyable. It takes great skill to make a satire pleasing.

"Daniel Boone's Bravery" (Kalem), October 18.—In this film the fabled prowess of Daniel Boone in his numerous contests with the Indians is exemplified. There are hot races with the Indians, capture, escape and chase, with little touches here and there which help to give life to the picture. Boone, securely tied, rolls into the fire and burns his bonds loose. Were there tobacco lofts in Boone's day sufficiently large and well filled to permit hiding, such as is shown here? The picture is alive and the audience clearly enjoys its swing and movement.

"The Cure of John Douglass" (Lubin), October 14.—Perhaps the plan here illustrated would not be recommended by temperance workers to cure men of drinking. Maybe it would not work well in all instances, but when Douglas came to himself and saw the scene set for him he believed himself a murderer and promised never to drink again. The return of the friend supposed killed made no difference with his resolution. The expression when he comes to think himself a murderer is an excellent piece of acting.

"Selecting His Heiress" (Vitagraph), October 18.—Effusiveness failed to impress the wealthy uncle and the calm indifference of the elder sister rather grated upon the old gentleman's nerve. But when he came to "die" he discovered that the effusive affection of the twins could not be relied upon, while the undemonstrative relative is proved true. Uncle creates considerable consternation by unexpectedly coming to life. And the undemonstrative relative is surprised to be made his heir. The film is rather novel and is interesting throughout.

"Ordered To Move On" (Eclipse), October 18.—A species of biography. It represents the misfortunes and rebuffs of a musical genius, but closes with his success through a master who recognizes his ability.

"Madeira, Portugal" (Eclipse), October 18.—A travelog of more than ordinary interest, reproducing scenes in and about this favorite city. There are good surf effects, lively street scenes, pineapple growing, and an illustration of the wicker chair industry. All are clearly photographed from the most advantageous point of view.

"Mike's Hero" (Edison), October 18.—A good comedy, with a surprising ending. Mike becomes so despondent over the tramp's imposition that he decides to commit suicide. Then he finds the water too shallow, and discovers the tramp did not save his life. The very vigorous expulsion of the tramp at one door allows peace and happiness to enter at the other. An amusing picture, well acted.

"Three of a Kind, a Trip Through the Garden of the Gods, Colo." (Edison), October 21.—A comedy-scenic in which the two girls and papa, with three English tourists, see the famous National Park in Colorado. They travel on burro-back. The scenes are fine; the comedy not very brisk, nor very natural. The last, a dissolving scene, shows the three dudes bringing each a colt burro as a present to the girls. Papa takes the girls away by the ear; we see the three men and, before one knows it, they have changed into the three donkeys. The audience thoroughly enjoyed it.

"The Tobacco Industry" (Lubin), October 21.—An industrial, showing how tobacco is seeded in, transplanted to the fields and how the growing plant looks at different stages of its growth. It also shows how the crop is gathered and cared for. The sorting, dipping, stripping and cigar making are also shown. It is very interesting.

"Her Exclusive Hat" (Lubin), October 21.—Wifey wanted a hat that was exclusive and bought it despite her husband's protest. On the way home an exact duplicate passed. Then wifey was mad. There is some amusement in it.

"Willie's Conscience" (Lubin), October 21.—Everybody looked like a cop to Willie after he had stolen a penny from his sister's toy bank. The street was full of cops, and Willie ran home and confessed to his mother. It is well done.

"The Cross of Pearls" (Melies), October 19.—A film with a Mexican setting, with the sacredness of the confessional as a strong feature in the action. Two men are rivals for a girl's hand. The rejected one is jealous, and through the loss of a handkerchief is enabled to fasten a crime upon the other. And the priest to whom he confesses is the victim's own brother, but his lips are sealed and he is forced to see his brother condemned to die for a murder he did not commit. Conscience causes the real culprit to confess in time to save the accused man's life, though the tension has been so great that he falls dead when he has made his confession. The film is very emotional, and the acting and the staging are important parts of the picture.

"How They Stopped the Run On the Bank" (Selig), October 19.—The principal interest in this picture will center in the two hundred of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of Illinois, who had a part in the story. It was a good scheme to station a ferocious lion at the door of the bank to greet customers when they entered to begin the run. The way they disappeared, or tried to place as much distance between themselves and the bank as possible is humorous. The picture is a good one. How could it be otherwise when such a handsome company posed for it?

"The Adventures of Billy" (Biograph), October 19.—This film pictures the influences that surround such a waif as Billy, a newsboy. To be effective, such a picture must ring true. To the reviewer the picture seemed "manufactured" so as to be dramatic and effective, but a policeman who saw it was asked for an opinion and he said, "It's the best film I ever saw. That boy was sharp and I think the dog was fine, too." Billy saw the yegg tramps kill a man for his purse. They intended only to stun him. It became necessary to get Billy out of the way and he is saved by a clever bulldog, who brings help. Yet the picture doesn't give the full and powerful effect that absolute truth would have given. It is, however, a very good story.

"The Mesquite's Gratitude" (Kalem), October 20.—An Indian love story, with an interesting background. In substance it tells how a white man defended an Indian girl from insult and she in return hid him when the sheriff was following him for being too vigorous in a punishment which he inflicted upon a rowdy. The fights are savage enough, but there is a tender scene in the love making and the audience is ready to congratulate him when "Kid" leads the Indian girl home as his bride. The sudden reformation of the rough gang at the ranch is an incident which helps the story, since it enables the Kid to live with his Indian bride in peace.

"The Cabin Boy" (Vitagraph), October 20.—Twelve years or more is a long time, even in motion pictures, to wait for the correction of a mistake which breaks up a family. The audience is carried through a misunderstanding due to a letter from which the signature had been cut and sees the wife desert her home and go elsewhere. The husband returns from his voyage and fails to find any trace of his people. The episode of the cabin boy, his own daughter dressed as a boy, brings the family together again. A true human sentiment is so strong that, as in this case, it often makes a not very convincing incident effective as though it were true. The audience followed this picture with interest.

"His Better Self" (Selig), October 20.—A love drama in which, as is usual in such photoplays, the course of true love seems to be beset with difficulties, caused in this instance by the appearance of a city man who by comparison detracts from the homely virtues of the country lover. There are a number of troublesome scenes, but eventually true love wins and the country lover comes into his own. The little drama was well received and excited sympathetic interest in a New York theater.

"Dr. Bill's Patient" (Essanay), October 20.—Love at first sight supplies the basis for this rather interesting and lively drama. The doctor receives word to call at the Bingle home and believing that the daughter is ill is chagrinned to find it is a pet poodle. When he receives the second call to the same house he doesn't intend to be deceived again and takes a full veterinary outfit. It is the daughter this time. The doctor applies the proper treatment for her ailment. Her father is importuned for his consent and a rapid-transit love play comes to a delicious close.

"A Trip Down the Magdapis River" (Pathe), October 20.—An interesting travelog, illustrating the thrilling ride down a rapids in this stream. The surrounding scenery is magnificent and the trip, though short, is attractive and leaves the audience wishing for more. A trip through the rapids in a canoe is thrilling, even on the screen.

"Eva Moves In" (Pathe), October 20.—A lively comedy which introduces some novelties and where seen by this reviewer kept the audience laughing. It is short.

"Up the Flue" (Pathe), October 20.—On the same reel with the above is another short comedy which keeps the audience amused. The surprising antics of some of the characters make this picture as lively and interesting as the average attendant at a motion picture show would care to see.

"A Conspiracy Against the King" (Edison), October 20.—An elaborate and interesting film. Indeed, it hasn't a dull moment, though the scene where the knight of the road agrees to take the secret papers from the messenger, because a girl asks him to do it, doesn't seem quite convincing. Maybe, however, much may be allowed for the time and the occasion and to this must be added the entreaty which always abides in the request of a pretty woman in trouble. The gallant gentleman is captured with the papers in his possession and it looks rather squally for him, but the girl is equal to the emergency and again makes a request which is readily granted by the opposite party. Thus she is able to save the man who assisted her. The lovers, reunited, are left in their happiness, while the knight, who was considerately imprisoned in a pantry, gallops away. This picture is produced with the art which is a marked characteristic of the Edison films. Any audience will be pleased with this and managers will make no mistake in including it with their program.

"Jimmie in Love" (Gaumont), October 24.—The Gaumont Jimmie has won American audiences. In this picture as in others, he keeps us laughing. It isn't loud laughter, but it has quality. This picture will be popular.

"Ostrich Plume Industry" (Gaumont), October 24.—This industrial on the same reel with a Jimmie picture makes a number that is very acceptable. It's an instructive and interesting picture.

"Pathe's Weekly," October 24.—It is as widely interesting and good as usual. Some of the remarkable things in it are the pictures of the "Liberte," the French warship lately destroyed at Toulon; a monster blast at Allentown, Pa.; the King of Italy reviewing troops; the German Emperor and Empress at the dedication of a church at Stuttgart, Germany; a Curtiss aeroplane rising from water and alighting on it, etc.

"Lady Godiva" (Vitagraph), October 21.—The story of the noble Countess of Coventry, who by riding through the city unclothed saved the people from a grievous tax, is widely known. Tennyson's poem on her sacrifice has furnished the scenario for this picture, which is a very fine piece of art and picture-craft, full of spiritual significance. The impression it makes is distinctly human and tender. The audience seemed to be clearly moved by it.

"The Foolishness of Jealousy" (Vitagraph), October 23.—Miss Julia Swayne, in a recent picture, "The Cabin Boy," portrayed the broken-hearted jealousy of a proud, but simple-minded woman. Her portrayal of Mrs. Dickinson in this picture shows a flighty, temperamental woman in the throes of a very needless jealousy. Nothing will suit Mrs. Dickinson save to have her husband melting in contrite tears beside her bier. She had no idea of committing suicide, for she must be there and see it. She drapes a bier in the parlor between two candles and wreaths roses around its pillow. Dickinson, however, comes home before she expects him, and from the library door, sees his wife climbing up to lie cold and white under death's solemn wings. At first he can't make it all out, but gets a glimmer of understanding and plays the jolly widower. His wife springs up and fires the serving maid. The comedy started the audience laughing early, and kept it laughing till the end, and laughing heartily.

"A Western Redemption" (Essanay), October 21.—He began a bad career in the East, was a gangster and became a Western bandit, and, as the hero of this kind of story, had to be converted. His parents had charge of a store that he and his pal robbed. His pal knew, but didn't dare tell him. They divided the loot and his pal got away. In the loot that came to him was his mother's locket, and he understands. Furious at his pal for not telling him, he overtakes him and not only surrenders himself but brings in the pal at the point of his gun. Afterward he leads his new life. The story was clear; the audience applauded.

"The Masked Huntsman" (Gaumont), October 21.—In one or two of its pictures of late the Gaumont Company has used for its backgrounds the reaches of a quiet stream full of glamour and poetry. This picture in the same setting is not so successful as its other recent pictures have been. It is a hard, not a very human, story; in fact, such an incident as Maupassant would have utilized to create a new impression of horror. The picture doesn't accomplish this; it fails to get a very firm grip on the situation. The father of the heroine, a game keeper, is troubled by a masked huntsman. His daughter is on the stream rowing by moonlight. He fires and badly wounds her.
